Iraq given further ultimatum as US troops fly in

By George Graham in Washington and Mark Nicholson in Kuwait

THE US, Britain, France and Russia last night delivered another ultimatum to Iraq, warning it to give clearance for United Nations aircraft to enter the country by 9pm GMT or risk being in breach of its obligations under a series of UN resolutions. Iraq's UN representative Nizar Hamdoon was reported shortly before the deadline to have said Baghdad had agreed the flights could resume but could not guarantee their safety in the event of another allied military attack.

The warning also demanded the removal of Iraqi police posts from Ruwaiti territory. It came two days after a raid by allied aircraft on missile sites in the air exclusion zone in southern Iraq. President George Bush declined to spell out what action might follow if Iraq did not comply with the ultimatum. "Sufficlent warnings have been given. They know what they must do. This is not just the US, it's the given Iraq only one choice, that is the choice to go to war," said the government newspaper al-Jumbouriyah. The US said it could not confirm another Iraqi claim that its anti-aircraft batteries had fired on a "hostile air target" in the south of the country. The latest US ultimatum was issued shortly after more than Iraq claimed yesterday its air 300 troops from the US Army 1st manoeuvres with the Kuwait defences had chased off a mili-

Fort Hood in Texas. A further two jets were due to land during the night. US officials expect the full complement of about 1,100 troops to be in place by tonight.

They comprise a reinforced brigade of two MIA1 battle tank companies, an infantry company using Bradley fighting vehicles and an artillery battery. Officials stressed that the troops would not be employed to police Kuwait's border with Iraq.

The fresh deployment will bring to about 1,700 the number of US military personnel in Kuwait. The brigade will conduct be an "open-ended" deployment. The 1st Cavalry held exercises with the Kuwaitis last August and October and the present deployment represents an accel-eration of a joint operation planned for later this year.

In spite of the highly trumpeted arrival of the US forces, there were no signs last night that Iraq had dismantled six police posts on the Kuwait side of the UN-designated border, as the UN Security Council had ordered it to do by midnight last night. The police posts, ramshackle structures each manned by up to a dozen Iraqi police, lie between one and two kilometres into

Kuwaiti territory under the new UN border demarcation. Mr Richard Cheney, US defence secretary, warned President Saddam Hussein not to gamble about the US's readiness, if necessary, to launch further military attacks, either before or after Mr Bush hands over to Mr Bill Clinton next week. Inflation falls to 2.6% but underlying rate rises

By Emma Tucker, Economics Staff, in London

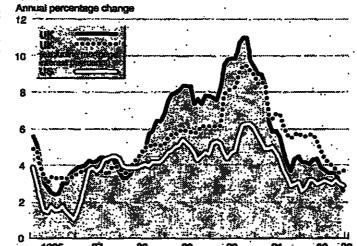

BIG CUTS in mortgage interest rates pushed down UK retail price inflation - the so-called headline rate - to 2.6 per cent last month, the lowest rate for 61/2 years.

But the Treasury's chosen measure of underlying inflation, which excludes mortgage interest payments, crept back up. Higher seasonal food and petrol prices were the main factors behind the rise in the annual rate of underlying inflation last month. Prices rose by 3.7 per cent in the year to December compared with 3.6 per cent in the year to November. This was the first rise in the annual rate since

March last year. The latest increase leaves the underlying rate of inflation near the upper end of its target range. Last autumn Mr Norman Lamont, the chancellor, said the government aimed to keep this measure within a range of 1-4 per cent, and to bring it down to 2 per cent before the end of this

Mr Anthony Nelson, economic secretary to the Treasury, said yesterday he was confident the neadline rate would fall further this month. He described the rise in underlying inflation as "very marginal" and said it was well within its parameters. The government was "absolutely deter-mined" it remained so, he said. Mr Gordon Brown, shadow Inflation rates chancellor, said: "While headline inflation has fallen because of the ssion, the underlying rate is rising and is heading towards the upper end of the government's target range." Most economists expect the headline rate of inflation to continue falling this year as further interest rate cuts affect the index. but they are less sure about the direction of the RPI excluding mortgage interest payments.

Earlier this week figures for producer prices showed that sterling's devaluation has pushed up the prices of raw materials and fuels. Manufacturers' output prices have also risen slightly, but so far they have resisted passing on the higher costs to retailers.

Mr Robert Lind, economist at UBS Phillips & Drew, the investment house, believes the Treasury's underlying measure will rise above 4 per cent because of the effects of devaluation.

Mr Simon Briscoe, UK economist at the investment house Greenwell Montagu, said: "Our measure of core inflation, which measures only the prices of goods and services that you buy in shops, fell again this month. We consider this to be indicative of

NatWest rules out general pay increase

By John Gapper and Robert Taylor in London

NATIONAL Westminster Bank, one of the largest white collar employers in Britain, yesterday signalled a tough 1993 pay round by telling its 80,000 staff that it could not afford to offer an across-the-board pay rise.

NatWest, which is among the most influential setters of pay trends in the UK labour market, said staff would only receive performance-related pay rises. These will vary between 3 and 6 per cent for most staff, with a minority getting no rise.

The NatWest offer is the first in the banking pay round and may be followed by other low offers from high street banks, which are trying to restrain costs. Barclays Bank, which could declare a loss for 1992 in March, meets unions next week. The pay offer, which was strongly criticised by unions, cates that signs of recovery in the economy are unlikely to be reflected in higher pay rises in the spring pay round. NatWest's pay settlement date is in April. Further signs of pressures on pay emerged in a telephone survey conducted by the Financial Times yesterday, which found that more than 20,000 employees of recession-hit construction companies have had earnings frozen. Mr Mike Goodswen, NatWest's director of human resources, said

make an across-the-board pay increase because of internal cost pressures and because the state of the labour market did not require it.

Mr Goodswen said the move did not constitute a pay freeze, as some union leaders yesterday described it. "That is part of the old mentality," he said. He esti-mated that NatWest's pay bill would rise by at least 3 per cent. The bank said it would compensate for the lack of a general increase by raising performancerelated pay increments by between 0.5 and 1.5 per cent. Increments for non-managers are split into three bands: satisfactory, good and outstanding. Staff who are judged satisfactory and are are not at the top of pay bands will receive '. tween

4.5 and 6 per cent, as opposed to between 4 and 5 per cent. Those graded outstanding may receive up to 7.5 per cent.
The NatWest Staff Association, bank's staff, said employees were not being rewarded for their con tribution to expected increased profits in this financial year. Mr Dai Davies, NWSA assistant general secretary, said staff faced "continual pressures to achieve sales in the face of severe customer criticism" as well as the fear of compulsory redundancy and the erosion of fringe benefits.

Italian authorities arrest alleged Cosa Nostra boss

By Robert Graham in Rome

THE ITALIAN authorities yesterday achieved a breakthrough in the fight against organised crime with the capture of Mr Salvatore "Toto" Riina, acknowledged to be the boss of Cosa Nostra, the umbrella organi-sation of the Sicilian Mafia.

Mr Riina, who has been on the run since 1969, is wanted in connection with some 80 killings. Police believe he was behind the assassination last year of the two leading anti-Mafia magistrates, Giovanni Falcone and Paolo

"This is an extraordinary blow [to the Mafia] and we hope this arrest will have significant reper-cussions," said Mr Nicola Mancino, the interior minister. "The Mafla has not been beaten but we have arrested a very dangerous mafloso," he added. Some 16 leading figures are still on the

Mr Rilna's arrest exemplifies the determination of the government of Mr Giuliano Amato to combat organised crime and break the long-standing protec-tion given to the Maila by elements of the Italian state and among the political parties. The arrest was made in Palermo when special units of the Carabinieri stopped a Citroën in which Mr Rlina was driving with another person. Mr Riina presented false papers but offered no resistance. In the style of a true Maña boss, he was unarmed.

Earlier this week, Mr Mancino told journalists his main objective this year was the capture of Mr Riina. The fact that he was arrested in Palermo confirmed what many Mafia experts suspected - in spite of being Italy's most wanted criminal, he felt he had enough protection to remain in his native Sicily. Furthermore, police had previously said they believed he had undergone plastic surgery; but photographs showed that the 62-year-old Mafia boss had merely aged.

Mr Giuseppe Ayala, an investi-gating magistrate and close friend of Falcone and Borsellino, said: "It is a big blow but a certain bitterness remains given that Mr Riina was arrested in Palermo after being more than 20 years on the run. This was not luck; but showed if you want to do something in earnest, it can be done...if only it had been done earlier.' The son of a poor smallholder,

Mr Riina has been involved in organised crime since his early teens and married into one of the traditional Mafia families of Corleone. On the run for more than 40 years, the only time he was caught he escaped from house arrest in 1969 near Bologna. Nicknamed "Toto the short", Mr Riina was first identified in 1984 as the new head of the cupola, the council representing 14 leading Sicilian clans, by Mr Tommaso Buscetta. Mr Buscetta was the first top member of Cosa Nostra to break with the code of omerta (silence) and agree to turn state's evidence after his clan had been defeated in a bloody power struggle, won by Mr Riina and his Corleone clan. Greater protection and incentives granted last year to repentant mafiosi - pentiti - have encouraged more Mafia members to give evidence against their ses. This is believed to have played an important part in the government's recent successes in capturing leading Mafia figures. Among those talking under spe-cial protection is Mr Riina's for-

Bonn agreement on asylum but not on army

THE German government vesterday failed to forge a necessary two-thirds parliamentary majority in favour of changing the country's constitution to allow German soldiers to take part in UN peacekeeping and peace-making

In an often stormy debate, the opposition Social Demo-crats made it clear that they were not prepared to accept any use of the German Bundeswehr (armed forces) beyond exclusively UN peace-keeping operations.

However, on a separate ssue, the SPD agreed to a new formula to change the constitution on the disputed question of limiting the existing liberal law on political asylum, clearing the way for a deal next

Nato troops come under German law

By Quentin Peel

GERMANY and its North Atlantic Treaty allies which have troops stationed in the country yesterday finalised a deal to bring them more directly under German law. The agreement deal is intended as an important symbolic gesture by the Nato allies to remove any remaining suggestion that the troops are occupation forces in a defeated Germany. Although foreign troops have been broadly subject to German law in recent years, this deal tightens loopholes preventing them from operating above the law of the land. It has been negotiated over the past 16 months, at Germany's request, after Britain, France the US and the former Soviet Union gave the go-ahead for German unification in the so-called "two-plus-four" agree-

Some exemptions to German law are still provided for in the agreement, but the basic principle is that it will generally apply to troops stationed in the country, according to officials involved in the talks. Sensitive areas in the negotiations included protection of the environment, and the application of strict German labour laws to civilian employees of the allied forces. The German Länder, in particular, have been keen to tighten the rules controlling military exercises in environmentally sensitive areas. In a separate deal initialled

By Christopher Brown-Humes in Stockholm and James Blitz

SWEDEN'S central bank, the Riksbank, said yesterday price stability was its "over-riding objective" as it set an inflation target of 2 per cent a year for the economy from 1995.

This was the first specific policy statement from the bank since Sweden was compelled to float the krona last November.It came a day after the bank intervened in the markets to support the currency for the first time since then. For 1993 and 1994, the bank is aiming to hold underlying inflation to 2 per cent, although actual inflation will rise to some 5 per cent this year, following the depreciation of the krona and an increase in indirect taxes. "Price increases in excess of 5 per cent cannot be tolerated." said the central bank.

It did not signal any reduction in its key marginal rate, which stands at 10.5 per cent, nor did it suggest any specific exchange rate targets.

US inflation rate bonus for Clinton

By Michael Prowse in Washington

THE Clinton administration will inherit the best inflation outlook for a generation. according to figures released yesterday.

Data on production and exports, however, confirm that the pace of recovery from recession is likely to remain subdued by the standards of previous upturns.

The Labour Department said consumer prices rose 0.1 per cent last month and by 2.9 per cent in the year to December. With the exception of a temporary dip in inflation below 2 per cent in 1986, reflecting the halving of oil prices that year, this was the lowest annual increase since the mid-1960s.

The fall in inflation from an underlying rate of about 5 per cent in the late 1980s reflects a long period of economic stagnation and the conservative monetary policies of the Federal Reserve, the US central bank, which lowered interest rates only gradually during the

Some analysts, however, fear that if the recovery gains momentum, inflationary pressures will re-emerge later this year or in 1994. The outlook for production remains modestly encouraging. The Fed yesterday reported a 0.3 per cent rise in industrial output last month, taking the annual increase to 2.9 per cent.

This followed a 0.4 per cent rise in November and a revised increase of 0.7 per cent in Octo-

The improvement was uneven, with much of last month's gain reflecting a 5 per cent surge in the output of motor vehicles and parts. Production of information process-ing and industrial equipment was also strong. However, excluding cars, overall output of consumer goods was flat last month. The rate of capacity utilisation in industry inched higher to 79.3 per cent against 79.2 per cent

Separately the Commerce Department reported an increase in the merchandise trade deficit to $7.6bn in November against $7.2bn in October. This reflected a 2.8 per cent decline in exports which was only partially offset by a smaller percentage decline in imports.

The trade deficit deteriorated sharply in the second half of last year as the US domestic recovery coincided with a downturn in many overseas markets, including Europe and

The deficit for the first 11 months of last year was $75.5bn against $59.2bn in the same period of 1991. Most analysts are projecting a further deterioration this year as higher demand in an expanding US economy sucks in more

Brazilian inflation rate hits 1,149%

BRAZILIAN inflation reached 1,149 per cent last year, according to official figures released yesterday by the Federal Statistics Institute, writes Christina Lamb in Rio de Janeiro. By far the highest rate in Latin America, this is well up on the 475 per cent of the previous year, though lower than 1989 and 1990 when it reached 1,864 and 1,585 per cent respectively.

Economists see little reason to hope for a decline soon. The official consumer price index has been rising by more than 20 per cent a month for the last 14 months and Mr Carlos Antonio Luque, president of the Order of Economists of Sao Paulo, predicts inflation of 27 per cent for this month - up on 25.1 per cent

In June, Unisource signed up Sprint, the US telecommunications carrier, to provide global links outside Europe for its customers. Unisource is also looking for a carrier partner in

Tobacco advertising ban upheld

The Quebec Court of Appeal, in a test case, has upheld a federal government ban on tobacco advertising, ruling that it does not violate freedom of expression under the constitution, writes Robert Gibbens in Montreal.

A lower court had found the ban unconstitutional and the federal government had appealed. The tobacco industry, which has complied with the federal ban since 1989, said it would almost certainly take the case to the Supreme Court of Canada. The three major tobacco producers seeking a final ruling on the ban are led by Imasco, the Canadian arm of BAT Industries.

Somalia warlords sign pact

Somalia's feuding factions signed a pact yesterday to disarm their unruly militias and end the fighting which led to the deaths by starvation of more than 300,000 people, Renter reports from Addis

Senators give new cabinet easy ride

By George Graham In Washington

IF President-elect Bill Clinton is having trouble filling the jobs in his administration, the blame cannot be laid at the door of the Senate, which has so far offered a smooth ride to his cabinet nominees in their confirmation hearings.

A few have faced mild inter-rogation on past peccadilloes - Ms Zoe Baird, designated to be Attorney General, has become a symbol of a generation of yuppies for hiring an illegal alien as a nanny - but on policy issues, the Republi-cans have so far not lived up to their threats of stiff scrutiny. Beside Mr Warren Christopher, who as Secretary of State-designate underwent two days of intellectual duelling with Senator Jesse Helms, the senior Republican on the foreign relations committee, only Ms Donna Shalala has encountered anything resembling tough questioning - and that has come mostly from the Democrats. In hearings this week Ms Shalala, who has been chosen to head the Department of Health and Human Services. was criticised for focusing her statement almost entirely on health care reform, largely ignoring welfare reform, which has been a central concern for some Democrats. Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan, chairman of the Senate finance committee, said he was distressed by "the clatter of campaign promises being tossed out the window," and Senator Jay Rockefeller, another Democrat who has taken the lead on health and social issues, said he heard rumours that, for strategic and political reasons, "welfare reform is going to be put on a back burner.'

But the Senate can certainly not be accused of holding Mr Clinton up in the task of building his administration. Many committees have already voted for confirmation of the cabinet members who have come before them, even though Mr Clinton cannot actually nominate them until he is inaugurated next Wednesday. Most cabinet secretaries are expected to be formally confirmed on Wednesday or Thursday.

TALKS between the US and the European Community on lowering tariffs for industrial goods have ground to a halt, and no further negotiations are planned before next Tuesday's meeting of senior trade diplomats in the Uruguay round of trade liberalisation talks.

Earlier this month, the two sides agreed to work for a tariff deal by January 15 that could nave the way for an early overall Uruguay round accord. But "the ingredients for a deal aren't there", an EC official said vesterday.

The future of the six-year-old round, already more than two years behind schedule, now

Holland acts to promote use of electric vehicles

Companies get tax breaks for adopting electric-powered cars

By Ronald van de Krol in Amsterdam and Kevin Done In

THE Dutch government is to give companies tax incentives to encourage them to buy electric vehicles.

Dutch businesses which invest in electric-powered company cars are to be allowed accelerated depreciation of the vehicles under a new scheme designed to promote the use of electric cars.

The pressures on the car industry to accelerate the development of electric vehicles are intensifying. Toyota and Nissan, the two leading Japanese car makers are joining forces to develop an electric car, according to Japanese newspaper reports yester-

The newspaper Mainichi Shimbun said that Toyota and Nissan had begun talks on the development of common electric vehicle components. Japan's ministry of international trade and industry has set a target of having about 200,000 domestic electric cars in use by the year 2000. Last month the big three US car makers, General Motors, Ford and Chrysler, announced that they planned to co-operate more closely in the development of electric vehicles.

The three companies have signed an agreement to investigate co-operation in the design, development, testing and possible manufacturing of electric vehicle components which would ultimately be used in each company's own vehicles.

Two years ago the US car makers also formed a consortium to carry out research and development on advanced batteries that would be capable of providing electric vehicles with significantly increased range and performance.

The state of California has been at the forefront of seeking to encourage the use of electric vehicles through regulation - by 1998, 2 per cent of cars sold in California are to be so-called zero emissions vehicles.

Yesterday's move by the Dutch government is one of the first inititaives in Europe to encourage the purchase of electric vehicles through the use of tax incentives.

Shaft of light: the Commons trade and industry committee may yet oppose closure of the 10 pits

By Michael Smith

MINERS at the 10 pits earmarked by British Coal for early closure seem assured of iobs until at least well into the spring after the government yesterday gave consultants until the middle of March to report on the mines' viability.

will be several weeks, or months, of debate even after the report is completed. Unions have already said that they do not accept consultants John T. Boyd as the independent scrutineer called for by High Court judges last month. The March 15 deadline set yesterday by Mr 10 to cease production with Michael Heseltine, trade and industry secretary, may slip further. He acknowledged this in the terms of reference which say that he may agree to a later date.

Before the High Court decision, British Coal had planned to make the miners redundant on January 29. The corporation said yesterday that no decisions would be taken on the pits' future until all consultations were complete. This means that it will go on paying the miners their basic pay. Betws, in south Wales, yesterday became the last of the representatives of the 90 miners there saying they had figures showing it was heading for a £1m profit this year. Perhaps the best hope for the

Cuts may cost 33,000 jobs, council chiefs fear

By Andrew Adonis

MORE THAN 33,000 jobs will be lost in local government in England over the next year, mostly due to government spending curbs, according to a survey of council chief executives published yesterday. But those figures could be greatly exaggerated, on the basis of another study released yesterday finding that the number of job losses in local government last year was far lower than that expected before final budgets for 1992-93 were agreed in March.

A Local Government Chroni-cle survey of 140 councils, employing 1.3m of the 1.6m staff in English councils, found chief executives estimating that at least 33,000 jobs will be lost between now and April 1994, with 13,000 occurring within the next three months.

"Other councils contacted said there would be job losses but they had yet to calculate them - making the LGC figure an absolute minimum," it said. The 140 councils surveyed said that they would need an extra £1.23bn from the government to maintain existing staffing and service levels, in addition to the £21bn of government support already pledged for 1993-94.

When this year's grant set-tlement was announced, Mr Michael Howard, the environment secretary, said that it would "enable councils to maintain existing service provision", with "no need for job losses"

However, a Municipal Journal survey of local government job losses in the year to September 1992 reports that 10,300 jobs were lost. That was well below predictions by councils earlier in the year.

Several authorities that had predicted redundancies in fact increased their staffing levels. Mr Michael Burton, the survey editor, said: "The picture in the end was unpleasant but considerably less gloomy than envisaged as far as jobs

Mr John Redwood, local government minister, dismissed reports of large-scale compulsory redundancies as "specula-

Culture and comfort remove Scottish appetite for new business The factors behind low company birth rate may be many and deep-rooted, writes James Buxton

HEN leading Scots were asked what they felt about their country's poor record on company creation, they gave replies which some will find disturbing. "New firms cause competition and displacement. This is not always an advantage to the economy," said one.

"In the long term a few start up businesses might help but I don't see them as crucial," said another. We would not need new firms if we paid attention to assisting and rescuing old businesses," was another view. This suggestion of complacency - if not hostility toward rising entrepreneurs is a sign of a cultural problem which appears to be a factor in limiting growth of new businesses, and hold-ing back the Scottish economy.

companies of more than 50 people between 1978 and 1990 was 77 new companies per 1m of population. The figure for the west Midlands was 86 and for south-east England 116. All were dwarfed by the performance of Massachusetts in the US

In 1990 125,000 people were working in independent businesses in Scotland set up since 1978 - but an extra 70,000 jobs would have been created if the Scottish business birth rate had matched that of the west Midlands, and 320,000 if growth had been as strong as in the south-east. None of this means that the Scottish economy is in terminal decline. Over the past two decades Scotland has escaped its dependence on heavy industry and achieved a more halanced economy. It has also suffered less severely from the recession than much of the rest of Britain. In a country of 5m people fewer than 250,000 are registered unemployed.

But why should Scotland, whose entrepreneurs thrived in the 19th century and whose expatriates head important businesses in England California and elsewhere, generate relatively few at home?

Scottish Enterprise's research, carried out by nine firms of consultants, attributed part of the blame to culture. Scots rated the entrepre-neur as fifth most admired profession, below teachers, bankers and manual workers such as plumbers and bus drivers. The English put entrepreneurs third after teachers and bankers, and Germans put them after teachers.

Entrepreneurs were not perceived as being the caring sort of people Scots are educated to admire. And interviews with people in the business and financial community, as well as trade unionists, academics, journalists and churchmen, revealed serious doubts about the value of new businesses Many believed it would be better to concentrate on helping existing companies and encouraging a continuing stream of inward investors. investment projects Scotland can

Scottish Enterprise's research showed that 570,000 men and 285,000

Yet the number of new inward hope for has been declining, and competition is hotting up.

In spite of what might seem a discouraging cultural environment, population - would like to start and believed they were capable of it, the same proportion as in Britain as a whole, though below the 21 per cent in the south-east.

But only 7 per cent of Scotland's potential entrepreneurs had taken up the challenge, compared with 13.7 per cent in southern England. The main reason was difficulty raising finance. Some complaints about banks and venture capital organisa-tions are familiar - borrowers complain that lenders are too cautious, and lenders say the projects are not good enough.

But two distinct Scottish factors play a part. One is that Scots tend to have less personal wealth than people in other parts of Britain. Slightly more than half of Scots own their homes, compared with more than two-thirds in England, and many Scots are new to homeowning – only 35 per cent were owner occupiers in 1979.

Since much lending for new ventures is secured on the house of the founder. Scots have less borrowing potential. Scottish houses are generally less valuable than those in southern England, so Scots may have less free equity in their house to support a second mortgage.

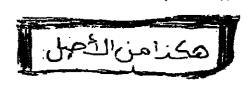

It is often said that Scotland is a village, a network of interlocking groups in which everybody knows somebody - ideal territory, it might be thought, for "networking", the process by which people with business projects contact individuals with money to invest.

Yet the research showed that networking operates poorly in Scotland, apparently because many would-be entrepreneurs are reticent about discussing ideas with friends, and many are not members of clubs and associations - "even the golf club was unusual", the Scottish Enterprise document says. The Scottish financial community was presented by those outside it as a closed circuit.

Another factor is the quality of life, which may mean that those people who do form companies find their ambitions satisfied relatively early, discouraging expansion. "The quality of life in Scotland is just to read of the control of th just too good and doesn't cost much to get a good slice of," one venture capitalist says. "If you are making £100,000 after tax from a business, you can afford a nice house and access to open space that in the south would need a much bigger income. For some, life's too comfort-

The campaign, called Bank Watch, has been launched by the Chartered Institute of Building, which represents more than 30,000 managers and directors of construction companies.

The move, announced vesterday, came two days after 18 MPs put their names to an early day motion expressing concern at Clydesdale Bank's 'cynical" decision to call in the receivers at Lilley Group. the Glasgow-based construction company. Mr Julian Barlow, institute commercial director, said that there had been a sharp rise in members' complaints of undue pressure from banks leading to an increase in bankruptcies and liquidations.

"Companies become even more vulnerable when a recession ends and land prices start to rise again and banks can see an opportunity to get their money back from selling assets," he said.

"We want our members to monitor the behaviour of banks so that we can prepare a dossier which can be presented as evidence to lending institutions, MPs and government ministers."

Initially it is battling for sales in one of the few sectors to have grown during the recession - the off-road four-wheel-drive market. Such vehicles have become fashionable among city dwellers who may never do any off-road driv-

Chrysler's offering is the Jeep, possibly the world's best known name in four-wheeldrive. The first military versions, along with landing craft and the Douglas Dakota aircraft, were credited by President Dwight D. Eisenhower nicknamed Ike - with winning the second world war.

The Cherokee, the Jeep model which most closely rivals Rover's successful Land Rover Discovery and Range Rover models, and the Wrangler, a much revised version of the machine for which President Eisenhower had such affection, are to tackle a ITK four-wheel-drive leisure sector where sales were estimated at more than 40,000 last year.

A measure of the seriousness with which Chrysler is taking the UK market is that the Cherokee has been reengineered as a right-handdrive model. The company says it is the first volume production model built with righthand-drive for export to the UK by a north American manufac-

The market is due to become more crowded later this year when Ford and Nissan launch their respective badged versions of a vehicle similar in size to the Discovery. This model will be produced at a Nissan plant in Spain, and will he sold in Europe under both Nissan and Ford names.

The vehicle, code-named ET by Nissan which has yet to give it a brand name, are to be under 20 per cent to 9,698 from Both parties are cautious about predicting market prospects in the UK. Mr Ian McAllister, chairman of Ford of Britain, said: "We will have to see how sales develop after it is launched in late spring."

Sales of the smaller, cheaper four-wheel-drive leisure vehicles such as Vauxhall's Frontera Sport, which are becoming fashionable among younger drivers as an alternative to sports cars, also rose sharply in the first 11 months of last year. They rose by just 8,112. For Vauxhall the target is to topple Suzuki's Vitara. which accounted for 5,800 of these sales.

The Jeeps will be sold through an initial network of 80 dealers. Mr Richard Mackay, managing director of Chrysler Jeep Imports UK, expects this network to grow steadily as Chrsyler's market presence becomes established. His company is based in Dover and was set up by TKM, the multifranchise vehicle distributor and retailer.

year are expected. Mr Mackay, rival importers and Land Rover executives all believe that there remains a great deal of growth in the leisure four-wheel-drive sector, which has quadrupled in the UK in less than a decade.

The sector, once dominated by utilitarian vehicles such as the Land Rover, has grown largely as a result of Japanese importers. They have broadened the market with a variety of vehicles of all sizes, and with those such as the cheap est Suzuki models costing little more than a small hatchback Mr John Norman, Suzuki GB's managing director, believes the marketing to young buyers of the SJ model as a leisure vehicle was a crucial factor in changing British attitudes towards such vehicles. The SJ was depicted in one advertising campaign as a "wild weekender". Rover Group's Land Rover subsidiary has been the prime beneficiary of the trend.

With its Range Rover model having secured a similar "lifestyle" niche at the top end of the market, the company's launch of its similar-sized but cheaper Discovery model in 1989 has proved more successful than even it had hoped. Discoveries have replaced more traditional estate cars across large swathes of suburbia, and the model is the undisputed UK market leader with nearly 10,000 sales last year. Chrysler's market research indicates there are some 4.5m people aged 24 to 40 with "active" lifestyles who are potentially receptive to the £3m advertising campaign it is

Signs of recovery in north-west

By lan Hamilton Fazey, Northern Correspondent

A SLOW but fragile economic recovery appears to be building in north-west England and north Wales, according to the latest quarterly surveys by the regional chambers of commerce and industry in Manchester and Liverpool.

After faltering last summer, domestic orders between October and December resumed an upward trend which began in 1991. Business confidence has also improved, and a few companies have revived investment plans. But redundancles are forecast nevertheless.

Both chambers report buoyant export markets, with the Liverpool chamber's servicesector members responding faster than manufacturers to the devaluation of sterling in Manchester chamber's manufacturers, however, reported strong export sales.

Electrical market forecast to fall 2%

By Tony Jackson and Alan Cane

THE UK market for electrical and electronic equipment is likely to contract by as much as 2 per cent this year, Mr Juergen Gehrels, chief executive of the UK subsidiary of Siemens of Germany, predicted yesterday. He said it would be the first time in more than a decade that the £37bn market had failed to grow. His prediction casts further doubt on the prospect of a consumer-led economic recovery this year. Mr Gehrels said the market had grown consistently by up to 8 per cent a year over the past 10 years but was essentially flat in 1992.

The UK company, however, which includes Siemens Plessey Electronic Systems and a 40 per cent stake in GPT Holdings, increased revenues by 3.9 per cent to £861.3m last year and expects to break the £1bn barrier this year. Mr Gehrels said the company was profit-able overall, but if the contribution from the GPT telecommunications joint venture with GEC were excluded, it was in

He agreed, however, that the company had paid too much for its share of the joint bid with GEC for Plessey in 1988 and that the cost increases as a consequence of devaluation on goods imported in to the UK were a "tremendous problem". Last year Siemens UK had exports of £186m against imports estimated at £170m. Siemens spent £137m on research and development in the UK last year, equal to 16 per cent of Siemens UK turnover. Clinton's viewpoint

A WEEK from now Mr Bill Clinton will be president of the US. Whether his elevation represents the decisive break with the free-market economics of his two predecessors is, as yet, far from clear. What is clear, however, is the change he represents in attitudes to government itself. Unlike Mr Reagan or Mr Bush, Mr Clinton believes in it passionately. What is more, as a Democrat facing a Democratic Congress, he has the capacity to act on that belief. Yet to govern is to choose. Mr Clinton will have to make his

The new president wants to achieve the economic regeneration of the US. Yet Mr Michael Boskin, outgoing chairman of the council of economic advisers, argues in his annual Economic Report of the President that the US is not in economic decline relative to most other advanced industrial countries. He is right. Of industrial countries, only Japan's overall economic performance has been notably better over the long term.

Mr Boskin is not a pseudonym for Dr Pangloss. He admits the "deplorable" quality of secondary education, an excessively costly healthcare system that fails to insure many Americans, and continuing high levels of poverty. It is to Mr Clinton's credit that these are the main items on his agenda. Unfortunately for him, some of these problems - the poor quality of secondary education, for example - may be beyond the power of even the most determined president to remedy. Meanwhile, those that might be remediable incomplete health insurance, for example – are likely to add a huge burden to a budget already drowning in red ink. The more Mr Clinton chooses to increase public spending, the less he will be able to reduce the yawning fiscal deficit. That is no trivial matter, however, since the fiscal deficit is the single most important remediable tal accumulation.

To make the new administration's dilemma worse, Mr Richard Darman, the outgoing budget director, admitted last week that the US fiscal deficit was more likely to widen than narrow, on unchanged policies. In view of Mr Clinton's ambitions for public spending, his promise to cut the oudget deficit in half in his first term is likely to suffer the same fate as similar promises from his cause for the low US rate of capi-

Fortunately for the new president, what he inherits is not in all respects as unhealthy as the fiscal arithmetic. The US economy is gest in the Group of Seven leading industrial countries this year. A relatively strong US economy, combined with dismal performance almost everywhere else, is the opposite of what the hapless Mr Nicholas Brady had to face throughout his term of office. It will help give Mr Lloyd Bentsen, Mr Clinton's nominee as US Treasury secretary, the platform from which to "reassert leadership in the G7", as he desires.

Mr Bentsen may even find him self pushing, if not on an open door - the Bundesbank's never is, where expansionary policies are concerned - at least on one that is not locked and bolted. It is encouraging, moreover, that so senior a figure in the forthcoming administration recognises the importance of active international engagement. Mr Clinton's domestic agenda was, it once seemed likely to crowd out international concerns. Perhaps that danger has been overstated.

Religious attachment

The fundamental question is not whether the US should be engaged, but how, What, in particular, should it try to do in the G7? It must not repeat past experiments with exchange rate co-ordination. The monetary effects of those attempts were probably the most important single cause of Japan's bubble economy and its aftermath, which also explains the Bank of Japan's unwillingness to pursue expansionary monetary policies today. There is little more chance of achieving exchange rate co-ordination with the principal European economies. Given the almost religious attachment to fixed exchange rates of so many of them, this may be surprising. The exception, however, is Germany and it alone is in a position to bind the European currencies to the US dollar and the Japanese

Nevertheless, economic pressures ensure that Germany will move still further towards expansionary policies. The Bundeshank may well move fast enough to save what is left of the ERM. Even so, the Bundesbank's movement remains too slow for the German

This continued inability of the German government to co-ordinate with the German central bank makes talk of international co-ordination seem rather ambitious. But some things must be attempted. Two items, in particular, should be on the top of the agenda: greater help for reform in the former Soviet Union and completion of the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations. Mr Clinton cannot escape these responsibilities. There can be no purely domestic US presidency and no lasting domestic success without an effective international hortly before Christmas, a City of London tour guide was interrupted as she delivered a brief history of the Bank of England over her coach microphone. Bemused American tourists found themselves listening to a conversation, relayed through the coach speakers, detailing the proposed negotiating terms for the acquisition of a chain of 35 shops in France.

The unwitting informant was on his telephone in the car behind. The details he imparted were of no interest to a group of Texan farm-equipment dealers, but someone, somewhere, might have gone to extraordinary lengths to get them. The thirst for finding out what the commercial competition is up to - highlighted in this week's High Court revelations over British Airways' campaign against Virgin Atlantic – appears unquenchable. Given the odds against a lucky break outside the Bank of England, companies are increasingly employing sophisticated corporate intelli-gence skills and equipment to ensure they are always well briefed.

The business of seeking or safeguarding business secrets is a growth market. "There has been a big change in attitudes among UK companies towards sizing up other businesses," says Mr Terence Burke, a former US Central Intelligence Agency and Drug Enforcement Agency officer, who heads the London office of IGI International, a corporate investigation company. Whereas companies were once primarily intent on protecting the bricks and mortar of their business against criminals, the value of commercial information and the potential damage inflicted by its loss is now regarded as just as important.

Business executives can also argue that they have a fiduciary obligation to discover, on behalf of shareholders and employees, what competitors are doing, providing it is legally obtained and does not invade people's privacy.

IGI has just stopped a UK com-pany signing a lease on an east European office block with a bogus intermediary. "That's a case of due diligence, not spying," says Mr

Mr Blenyth Jenkins, director of corporate affairs at the Institute of Directors, adds: "Every director of every company has a duty to know as much as possible about the competition. Even so, there are lengths beyond which they should not go in trying to find out."

But how far are companies, or the agencies they hire, prepared to go down the road to subterfuge and illegality in order to keep an eye on the competition? Are many of Britain's boardrooms really bugged, or are tales of widespread industrial espionage as fanciful as the plot of a detective thriller?

If current sales of electronic surveillance equipment are any guide, then UK business is overrun with professional busy-bodies, though they are not necessarily acting ille-gally: "To bug your own employees [at work, as Robert Maxwell did] may not be very nice but it's not going to land you in court," says one bugging expert.

Sales of all forms of surveillance equipment, much of it for protective rather than intrusive purposes. have risen throughout the recession. Products include "bugs" concealed in pens, calculators and credit cars. For the more stylish businessman, there is an electronic olive on a cocktail stick.

Estimates by larger suppliers suggest that up to 30,000 bugs are sold annually, with the large majority going to corporate customers.

As demand for business information grows, Michael Cassell examines the extent of UK company eavesdropping

Bugs infest the boardroom

David Benn, managing director of Lorraine Electronics, says nearly all his sales are to businessmen. There is a lot of corporate paranoia about information leaking out. One in 50 times something might be found but leaks are more likely to be the result of sloppiness. It is not only companies, but their professional advisers who are apparently regarded as fair targets for eavesdropping. One of London's largest law firms has its meeting rooms regularly swept for devices. A senior partner recalls: "Information was leaking out almost as soon as our meetings had ended. Nothing was found but there were clear signs of tampering.

A merchant bank executive in the City says his offices are also routinely scanned, part of a "safetyfirst" procedure that puts people and documents into categories of confidentiality: "Someone with the wrong category of documents in their possession can be fired."

To feed the appetite for information on companies, products and individuals, a new breed of professional corporate investigator is also emerging. Staffed with former barristers, bankers and accountants, these companies intend to dismantle the caricature of the slightly seedy detective agency run by chain-smoking ex-coppers.

If pushed, however, some legitimate agencies concede they might sometimes be tempted to stretch good business ethics to the limit. None of them say they would be prepared to mount a campaign to undermine the standing of their clients' competitors.

BA found to its cost that such a strategy can backfire, reflecting badly on the company and on everyone involved in it. The affair cost BA £610,000 in libel damages and an estimated £3m in legal costs after it accused Virgin of seeking publicity in exposing a "dirty tricks" campaign waged against it.

s with BA, the underbelly of covert corporate detection work is occasionally exposed. In 1990, as Laing Properties became the target of a hostile take-over attempt, it told the Takeover Panel it had found an electronic bug in its offices.

Three years earlier, three men were convicted for placing a listening device in a biscuit tin outside the home of an executive of Comet. a subsidiary of the then Woolworth group which was the object of a bid adopted by a large UK retailer to undermine another high-street multiple in advance of a takeover bid. The potential target, its suspicions aroused by unusually bad figures from some stores, installed listening equipment to eavesdrop on its managers. A startling tale emerged. Several managers had been bribed to depress sales returns,

making it more vulnerable to outside attack. Damning conversations were recorded, and the plotters backed off under threat of exposure. At present, there are two significant cases of alleged industrial espionage before the British courts, one involving the alleged sale of confidential information and the other centred on alleged attempts to plant "spy" in a competing business.

Most companies, however, are more interested in protecting what they hold than in extracting secrets from others, with some types of business more sensitive than others to the dangers of damaging leaks. Increasing numbers of businesse such as Heinz, the giant food products group, implement so-called "risk analysis" exercises, effectively employing outside professionals to prowl through the company, seeking out weak spots from which information might escape. Takeover bids heighten the need for stronger defences on both sides. BTR, the industrial conglor espionage involves the tactics used corporate investigators to check the security of its own information systems before bidding successfully in 1991 for Hawker Siddeley, the engineering group. The company was chastened to see the quality of information abandoned nightly by staff in dustbins.

More generally, tendering activity is seen as an area particularly volnerable to information leaks. Knowing what the opposition is prepared to hid can pay immense dividends.

The oil industry appears more prone than many to information seepage during the preparation of contract tenders. Other businesses in which security of information has a high priority include property development, where inside data can make a big difference to a deal.

In the intensely competitive consumer products business, advance information on new brands and pricing strategies can pay big bonuses: "If people think we just walk round the stores to find out what the others are doing, they are very wide of the mark," according to an executive in one personal products group.

is company, like many others, now operates a competitive intelligence department, charged with the task of legitimately monitoring the opposition. Computer manufacturers, too, run units with the same function.

A minefield of legality awaits those tempted to pursue more adventurous techniques. While anyone can purchase bugging and scanning equipment, the Interception of Communications Act and the Wireless and Telegraphy Act limit its use; to adopt a false guise can constitute misrepresentation, while tapping into computers can invoke the Data Protection Act or the Computer Misuse Act.

Infringements can be hard to prove. A Manchester property company allegedly spying on another was charged with stealing 5p of electricity to operate a bug, aithough the case was dismissed.

Mr Patrick Grayson, executive managing director of Kroll Associates, the US corporate investigator. says there is plenty of corporate information available on the record, provided people know where to look. Mr Grayson, whose own Savile Row offices are swept for bugs, says his company's activities follow a code which is based on strict adherence to the law.

"We sometimes have to make moral judgments and, as importantly, there is the matter of how any actions may be perceived. Dustbin emptying might not necessarily be illegal but it is certainly tacky. If some clients do not care how we get information, we do. Our reputation as well as theirs is at stake."

Companies like Kroll and IGI, however, have not escaped accusations of acting in ways that may not fully measure up to their codes of Mr Bruce George, the Labour MP for Walsall South - who has had his own Commons offices burgled is pressing for legislation to ensure that corporate investigators and other security specialists are licensed. "Which other country would tolerate investigators being allowed to operate as free agents?

There will always be some readily prepared to indulge in "dirty tricks", says Mr Steve Smith, deputy managing director of Carratu International, a respected corporate investigation company which itself has been bugged.

He tells the story of the bogus British Telecom engineers who ve been tracked down more than once in the City. "They have all the right gear and all the know-how. They tap identified lines from pavement junction boxes and listen in from a vehicle parked nearby. We've discovered their activities several times. But it's always too late to catch them."

MAN IN THE NEWS: Dr Radovan Karadzic

Just what the doctor ordered

Serbs, reviled throughout the world for their policy of "ethnic cleansing" in Bosnia, at last appears to have been outmanoeuvred. Against his own most fundamental convictions, and certainly those of his hardline colleagues, he will be forced next week to defend before his own parliament a constitutional agreement for Bosnia imposed on him by his closest ally, Mr Slobodan Milosevic, the Serbian president.

The shock-headed psychiatrist, whose specialities are neurosis and depression, may also be fighting for his political life. If the Bosnian Serb assembly, composed largely of the kind of extremists which make Mr Karadzic look moderate, reject the plan proposed by the international mediators in Geneva, he has threatened to resign. Given the general unreliability of his promises, it is perhaps more likely that he might be jettisoned by Serb military leaders, unwilling to give up the sub-stantial territorial gains they have made at the Moslems' expense.

It is a matter of supreme irony that Dr Karadzic should have been put in such a difficult position by the men who personifies his ideals of Serbian nationalism and a greater Serbia. To the surprise of most observers, with the exception perhaps of the mediators, Mr Cyrus Vance and Lord Owen, who had meticulously prepared such a scenario, Mr Milosevic exerted extraordinary pressure to make the Bos-nian Serb leader change his mind. "They really did twist Karadzic's arm unmercifully," a seasoned diplomatic observer said afterwards. Indeed, the normally loquacious Mr Karadzic was reported to have been reduced to virtual incoherence at propaganda machine, based in Pale, r Radovan Karadzic, the the end of the talks early this week, leader of the Bosnian when he saw the prospect of a Serwhen he saw the prospect of a Serbian "state within a state" evaporate - at least on paper.

Like many psychiatrists, the man whom Mr Lawrence Eagleburger, the outgoing US secretary of state, said should be one of those to be tried for war crimes, has something of a split personality - a Jekyll and Hyde. Though, physically, an intimidatingly large bear-like fig-ure, many of his visitors have been seduced by his personal charm. He has written, published and likes to talk about poetry – he did so last year on a BBC arts programme – and, incongruous though it might seem, he plays the Serbian lyre. He is a family man. His wife Lilyan is also a psychiatrist and his two chil-dren, both in their 20s, also study medicine. At one stage, Dr Karadzic was even the official doctor to the Sarajevo football team.

Those acquainted with the Bosnian Serb leader stress that "he enjoys the good life". He is reputed to have rented a villa for his family in Geneva for the duration of the peace conference, though he himself tends to stay in a hotel during the main negotiating sessions. "He is capable of anything — good or bad," in the words of a Yugoslav-born observer "He lies unconsciously in observer. "He lies unconsciously in order to please his interlocutors, and he probably persuades himself that what he says is true."

The examples of Dr Karadzic's capacity to play havoc with the truth are manifold. He has, in turn, flercely denied allegations of ethnic cleansing and the existence of detention camps into which thou-sands of Moslems have been herded, and then promised to open them to inspection and even to close them. At the same time, the Bosnian Serb near Sarajevo, has been disseminating the most horrific stories about alleged Moslem atrocities, most of which have never been confirmed by independent sources. At the Geneva negotiations, journalists may report his statements, but rarely believe them. This week, he made the throw-away remark as he went into the meeting at which he rejected the Vance-Owen constitutional proposals: "I am hoping for a compromise." A few hours later, after Mr Milosevic had done his work in a tête-à-tête meeting, he accepted the proposals - on condition that they were approved by the Bosnian Serb assembly.

Many believe that the reasons for Dr Karadzic's primitive form of Serbian nationalism in a region held up, in the past, as an example of successful ethnic integration, can be found in his origins. He is, in fact, not a Serb. Born in a mountainous region of Montenegro, he came to Sarajevo to find fame and fortune, but found it difficult to penetrate the intellectual Moslem elite. In a country divided into relatively sophisticated Moslem city dwellers and a rural population dominated by the Serbs, Dr Karadzic, of peasant origin, found a much greater affinity with the Serbs.

However, he did not emerge into the political limelight until 1990 when, after a spell in prison for the misappropriation of government funds (Dr Karadzic claims it was for anti-communist activities), he helped found the nationalist Serbian Democratic party, with the explicit objective of uniting all Serbs within a greater Serbia.

The objective has never changed

While the mediators have insisted in the Geneva negotiations on a uni-tary, if decentralised Bosnian state, divided into 10 semi-autonomous provinces, Dr Karadzic has fought simple ethnic division of the country into three communities (Serb, Moslem and Croat). In his view they should each be allowed to form "a state within a state" with full powers in domestic and international affairs. Implicit in his proposal is the expectation that the Bosnian Serbs would merge with Serbia simply when they decided to do so. Dr Karadzic's great idol, Mr Milosevic, appears temporarily prepared to abandon this dream, mainly because it is in Serbia's interests to persuade the interna-tional community to lift its sanctions. This has been the biggest blow suffered by the Bosnian Serb leader in his short political career. Yet he knows that, unless his own supporters and military leaders completely abandon him and force him to resign, he can live to fight another day. There are enough controversial elements of the package which remain to be negotiated the map of the provinces into which the country will be divided and the terms of a cessation of hostilities to enable him to spin out the talks and even to provoke their break-down. The resignation of Mr Poul Schlüter, conservative prime minister since 1982, has confounded hopes of a period of relative political calm inside the European Community. His fall as a result of an obscure scandal involving the treatment of Tamil refugees from Sri Lanka has injected fresh uncertainty over the development of the EC

The impact should not be exaggerated, since Mr Schlüter headed a shaky minority gov-ernment and Denmark's EC policy has always been the product of bargaining between the principal parties in the Folketing, the powerful Danish parliament.

But Mr Schlüter's resignation blurs what just four weeks ago appeared to be a clear road map for the Community. Last month at the Edinburgh summit EC leaders agreed to spell out legally binding Danish optouts on the Maastricht treaty on European political and monetary union, paving the way for a second referendum to be held around April 27.

The new year passed, Denmark took over the EC presidency, and national polls showed Danish voters overwhelmingly in favour of the treaty. With a Danish Yes in the offing, prospects improved for quick parliamentary ratification by the UK and the implementation of the treaty by late autumn.

Europe's case of the Danish blues

The odds still appear to favour approval of Maastricht. True, no one inside or outside Denmark is quite sure how the extended text differs in substance from the treaty rejected narrowly in last June's referendum. But seven out of Den-mark's eight political parties back the Edinburgh deal which sets out exemptions on mone-tary union, a common defence policy, EC justice and home affairs and common citizen-

More important, the main parties, notably the opposition Social Democrats, have pledged to campaign whole-heartedly for Maastricht. Last year they were content to let Danish business and the civil service defend what many Danes thought was an unsatisfactory treaty.

in June, almost 60 per cent of Social Democrat supporters failed to back the treaty, either because of a lack of enthusiasm or hostility towards Mr Schlüter's conservative-liberal coalition. If the Social Democrats form the next govern-ment, they would be likely to push Maastricht hard, recognising that the next referendum is Denmark's last chance to come back into the EC fold. Or so the argument in Copenhagen goes. But as the events of the past few months demonstrate, nothing in Den-mark is quite what it first seems. The country meets the but appears unwilling to take part in a single European currency. It vigorously supports the single European market but has serious reservations about common European citizenship. Danes can be dour (listen to Mr HOA Kjeldsen, president of the Agricultural Council talking about improvements in Denmark's pig slaughtering capacity); or they can be frivolous. The economic minister created a diplomatic incident recently when he joked about dispatching the Danish navy unless neighbouring Sweden shut down a nuclear power station near

The "Tamilgate" scandal contains similar contradictions. Mr Schlüter, 63, was not directly involved in the affair which began in 1987 when Mr Erik Ninn-Hansen, then justice minister, ordered civil servants to delay entry visas for the wives, children and relatives of

The Tamils had an explicit right under Denmark's liberal immigration law to bring their families into the country. But Mr Ninn-Hansen, judging that the prospects for peace in Sri Lanka were improving and that the Tamil refugee flow might ease, decided to delay consideration of the cases. The affair only became serious when it emerged that efforts had been made to prevent the

he declared to parliament in 1989 that "nothing has been swept under the carpet".

Mr Mogens Hornslet, the High Court judge appointed by Mr Schlüter to uncover the truth, last Thursday delivered a verdict so damning that the prime minister had no option but to resign. Having misled parliament so clearly, few believe that Mr Schlüter can come back, though he might stay on as a caretaker until a new prime minister is found. Danish officials this week were unsure whether to display pride in the open nature of Danish government or dis-may that it had cost their country one of the its most experience leaders since the second world war.

One foreign ministry diplomat recalled Mr Schlüter entering office in September 1982, ending the Social Democrats 50-year domination of Danish politics. "Nobody gave him six months," he said.

In the event, Mr Schlüter proved to be one of Europe's great survivors, a conciliator who presided over a period of political stability and rising prosperity as Denmark recovered from its huge budget and foreign debt burdens. On the bright side, the Tamilgate affair is a working model of Danish arguments in favour of more transparency in European Community decision-making and more accountability. Not many other countries would be prepared to sacrifice a prime minister to defend the rights of Tamil immigrants, one EC official said.

But the same official acknowledged that it was far from clear whether the majority of Danes viewed Tamilgate in the same light. Indeed, one interpretation is that the scan-dal is more a product of Denmark's tortured liberal political culture.

For despite its liberal immigration laws, most Danes are wary of immigrants. This week a poll showed 70 per cent in favour of tighter immigration

Mr Helvig Petersen, a former leader of the Radical Liberal party who supports the country's liberal immigration pol-icy, fears that a post-Tamilgate election campaign could lead to an ugly debate about the numbers of Turks, Pakistanis, Yugoslavs - and Tamils, "We are a very homogeneous population," says Mr Petersen, "we are not used to black people coming in and we have experienced more difficulties than we would have liked." As party leaders in Denmark struggled to resolve the politi-cal crisis yesterday, Mr Ivar Norgaard, chairman of the Folketing's market committee which oversees the EC, stressed the continuity in Danish EC policy and played down the potential damage to his country's presidency. The priorities were already with Sweden, Austria, Finland and Norway are to start next month; all Danes are looking forward to being joined by their Scandinavian neighbours who will, they believe, redress the southern tilt caused by the accession of Greece, Portugal and Spain. Moreover, all parties emphasise the need for EC decision-making to be more transparent and to be devolved to the lowest level. If the Social Democrat opposition, led by Mr Poul Nyrup Rasmussen, forms the next government, some change is certain. Initiatives to promote employment and to strengthen the environment will be given priority; free marketeers such as Mrs Anne Birgitte Lundholt, industry minister, will doubt-less go; and Mr Jacques Delors, president of the European Commission, will gain new allies in Copenhagen.

On Wednesday morning, Mr Delors met Mr Schlüter and Mr Uffe Ellemann-Jensen, the effervescent Danish foreign minister, to discuss the Danish presidency's plans for the next six months.

Once again Mr Ellemann-Jensen, who predicted confidently that Maastricht would be approved last year, showed a fatal attraction for forecasting. Asked about Tamilgate, he asked what the fuss was about. "I have every confidence that next week and next month the prime minister will still be Poul Schlüter and yours truly [as foreign minister]." His EC colleagues will be hoping that Mr Ellemann-Jensen's confidence in the future of the Community will prove more reliob Dickinson, marketing director at Miami's Carnival Cruise Lines, recently made a promotional video. To demonstrate on-board facilities. Carnival filmed an employee strolling through a cruise liner's atrium

 it was seven storeys high. The story illustrates the extent to which size dominates today's cruise-line industry. Carnival vessels, with names like Fantasy and Ecstasy, are essentially giant floating hotels, capable of housing 2,000 or more passengers. The surrounding ocean is almost incidental.

Only this week, Carnival - the world's largest cruise-line operator in terms of passengers carried -ordered a 95,000-ton ship from an Italian yard, at a cost of more than $400m (£263m). The vessel, which could be in service within four years, will have 1,300 berths and sleep up to 4,400 people. In terms of gross tonnage, it will be 25 per cent bigger than any cruise ship ploughing the seas at present (the QE2, by comparisón, is 67,000 tons).

But it is not just the ships that are changing. The notion that cruises are genteel holidays for the wealthy, full of Cowardesque figinterred. Today's cruise-line customer is more likely to be under 50, with an annual income of less than $50,000. He or she is probably a sun-seeker, headed for the Caribbean, who will spend fewer than seven days on board.

At first glance, these changes seem to have enabled the cruiseline business to navigate the recession in better shape than most of the leisure industry. Since the 1990s began, airlines and hotels have faced shrinking demand and severe financial pressures. In North America, easily the largest cruise market in the world, the

New York-based Cruise Lines International Association estimates that 4.4m people took cruises last year. That was an increase on 1991 of 10 per cent - which is also the average annual growth rate registered over the past decade. Occupancy rates for North American cruise operators averaged 85-90 per cent last year; US airlines struggle to achieve figures in the high 60s.

But beneath the surface, prospects are murkier. While demand increased, about one dozen new ships also came into operation in 1992, adding about 11,000 berths and increasing total capacity by about 12.5 per cent. This year, another five liners - including Carnival's giant Sensation, which is more than 850 feet long and gers - will also hit the high seas.

he industry's optimists, like Mr Dickinson, think that demand will grow to match the capacity expansion. They point out that, even in recessionary times, cruise holidays have appeal. The cost of such holidays is fixed at the outset, because the fare includes meals and entertainment. By adding in all the extra expenses attached to a conventional, land-based vacation, it may be cheaper to buy a cruise-line package than to stay at a hotel. Others in the travel industry are less sanguine. Travel agents, for uple, note that heavy discounting of published cruise-line fares has been prevalent for several years and shows no signs of letting up. "Published prices mean absolutely nothing," says one Manhattan-based travel agent. "Every time you turn around, someone's bringing on a new ship - there's so much overcapacity at present."

posted steady annual profit advances, half a dozen smaller companies are believed to have faced serious financial problems. A handful of companies, such as the Seattle-based Exploration Cruise Lines, have filed for bankruptcy protec-

Nevertheless, Cruise-ship owners claim that their "untapped" market is huge. CLIA, for example, cites market research showing that 60 per cent of North American adults "dream of taking a cruise", while only between 5 and 7 per cent of the population has done so.

The non-American market also presents a large potential source of new customers. In the UK, the world's second biggest market, the Passenger Shipping Association estimates that about 200,000 people went on cruises last year. A flight to Florida, followed by a Caribbean cruise, was the most popular

While the number of UK residents taking cruises has more than doubled since the mid-1980s, it is still tiny compared with the 11m who take air-based package holidays abroad. In Germany, the next biggest market, the PSA estimates the number of cruise passengers is only about 175,000. Although cruises are attracting younger UK customers, the industry concedes it still has work to do. Richard Bowden-Doyle, marketbiggest travel agent chain, says:

"The UK is a potentially lucrative market, but historically the British have seen cruising as a holiday for the blue-rinse brigade." He argues that is changing. Although recent UK-wide Lunn Poly presentations on cruising failed to attract people in their 20s, potential customers in their 30s did turn up. Bigger ships are central to the industry's attempt to extend the appeal of cruising. Operationally, large ships offer some basic economies of scale. Senior crew numbers, for example, do not increase proportionately with a ship's size. Nor do promotional expenses. But the main advantage comes on the marketing front. Many people still think of a cruise as too stuffy, Dickinson admits. "They expect a string quartet at four o'clock and a lecture on geranium-planting in the evening." The new jumbo ships quickly dispel this impression.

They are marketed as "fun ships", with casinos, spas, jogging tracks, even golf facilities. Cruise companies allow passengers to keep up with their favourite sports events. Norwegian Cruise Line and Royal Viking introduced big-screen showings of sports events last autumn, covering top league base-ball and baskethall games.

n answer to suggestions that travellers could grow weary of being confined in the company of several thousand other holidaymakers, Dickinson says defensively: "There are hotels with 2,000 rooms in Vegas," The Cassandras are not convinced. Gerald Celente, director of the Trends Research Institute in with the US hotel industry, which overbuilt in the 1980s now lives with the burdens of oversupply.

Does be not buy the argument that demand is just waiting to be tapped? "The huge potential mar-ket," he says, "has to have the money to spend. Look at the recent Christmas shopping...those people are simply going into debt again. They just don't have the dis-cretionary income." If he is right, cruise companies could find them-

Iraqi instability no surprise if its coastline confiscated

From Dr Richard Long.
Sir, Many of Iraq's troubles

stem from map-drawing at the end of the first world war. Saddam, more than any other of Iraq's rulers, has failed to come to grips with them. Much of the cartography was unfair. Worst of all was the Shatt al Arab boundary, which penalised the country which has almost no access to the sea while rewarding Iran, blessed with a more than ample coastline. This short-sighted arrangement was one of the chief causes of the Iraqi war with Iran in the 1980s.

Glad to leave darkest Britain

From Mr Alfred P Masondo. Sir, I read with interest the article "Africa: Frustrating but worthwhile" by "practical traveller" Nicholas Woodsworth (January 9). As he found so many "frustrations" travelling on the so-called "dark continent", I would be very interested in knowing if it is indeed worthwhile for British tourists to travel in Africa. Bearing in mind the many frustrations I have faced since I came to Britain, I will fortunately be leaving soon. I think the first thing I will do when I do return home to the "dark continent" is write an article entitled: "Britain - Frustrating and not worth it!" Alfred P Masondo, 97 Tenison Road, Cambridge CB3 IRQ

Tougher business entry regulation would give stability and strength From Mr Duncan Heenan.

Sir. The government and other optimists often quote the number of new company registrations as a sign of growth and regeneration of industry. This ignores the fact that very many of these are "phoenix" companies, set up to acquire the assets (but not liabilities) of bust businesses, often owned by the same people who owned the previous business. There is evidence that this process is sometimes a deliberate "financial cleansing": I am sure we have all seen it. Anyone with even 'O' level economics will know that a reasonable level of profits can only be maintained in any industry if there are barriers to entry sufficient to keep irresponsible traders out. UK com- | Gloucestershire GL52 4EN

pany and insolvency law does nothing to help in this respect, and while it continues to allow the recycling of assets in frag-mented and over competitive industries, it will delay the recovery of profits and the return of investor confidence. I suggest that stricter criteria are needed for those starting in business and who wish to enjoy limited liability, than the £50 or so it takes to buy an off-the-shelf company. In the long run, effective measures would lead to greater stability and industrial strength in many sectors. Duncan Heenan,

FNFC trims loss and seeks £46m

By John Gapper, Banking Correspondent

FIRST National Finance Corporation, the consumer credit group, yesterday announced a rights offering of $45.8m in order to rebuild its weakened capital base.

The group also disclosed a pre-tax loss for the year to end-October of £31.8m, reducing the previous year's deficit of £33.7m. It again passed its final

The issue of 47.6m convertible preference shares, at £1 each, will ensure that the company complies with the new minimum EC capital adequacy requirement for bank holding companies of 8 per cent capital to assets. It had been feared it would fall below this ratio in June, when it must repay £12m of loan stock. Up to £5m of the issue could also be used to strengthen its loss-making commercial finance arm.

FNFC said it would declare a dividend of 0.5p at the 1998 half year and a further 1p at the full year, if the issue was approved by shareholders at an extraordinary general meeting on February 8.

The group disclosed a strong credit subsidiary First National Bank for the second half. It made a full-year loss of £4.6m (£20.1m) in the year after a second half profit of £8.2m.

Tom Wrigley, group chief executive, issuing shares to ensure compliance with new EC capital adequacy requirements

First National Commercial Bank, performed badly because of a higher provision of £10m for bad loans in the second half. It made a pre-tax loss of £13.4m in the second half, taking the full-year loss to £18.9m

The group made a loss of £54.2m after tax and extraordinary items. The extraordinary loss of £25.1m included a £3.1m write down in the value of the company's premises and a £2.3m loss on the disposal of its leisure activities. Mr Martin Mays-Smith, chairman, said the outlook for the group was "much improved" after two years of heavy losses. The consumer credit operation was being made increasingly profitable by falls in interest rates. The group was very sensitive because it was financed principally by bank debt, and because minimum lending rates applied to consumer loans such as mortgages and advances for home improve-

When the one month London Interbank Offered Rate averaged 10.8 per cent in December last year, the net interest income on consumer credit balances was £7.8m. When it was 7.2 per cent last month, net interest income was £9.7m.

Analysts said the consum credit business, which made loss-making loans in the late 1980s when the company faced heavy competition, was likely improved credit scoring started to take effect.

The issue, on the basis of two convertibles for every seven ordinary shares and one for every 6.72 existing convertibles, was prompted by an erosion of the group's capital base from £217m of shareholders funds in October 1990 to £135m at October 1992.

The preference shares, which have a 7 per cent net yield, will be convertible into ordinary shares at a price of 63p from May 15 this year until May 2008. They would comprise 30.4 per cent of the group's fully diluted ordinary share capital. FNFC's shares rose from 56.5p to 71p on the announcement, and closed at 68p.

Airtours comes under strong attack from Owners Abroad

By Richard Gourlay

OWNERS ABROAD yesterday attacked the hostile bid launched by its rival tour operator Airtours, saying it had taken advantage of a profits fall that followed one mistake over holiday pricing at the end of 199L

Mr Howard Klein, Owners trading group rose 1p to 72p compared with the rights issue Abroad's chairman, said share-holders should not under-play price of 85p.

Referring to Airtours' share bid, which is accompanied by a partial cash alternative, Mr Klein said: "If you are looking down the barrel of that sort of thing who is going to want to take paper?"

Airtours' bid, he said, was a defensive move triggered by concern about the threat from a tie-up between Owners Abroad and Westdeutsche Landesbank, the German state bank that owns 86 per cent of Thomas Cook and 34 per cent of LTU, the German charter flights and holidays company. Airtours had provided no evidence to show it could run a group that would have £1.2bn of sales. Abbey National yesterday raised £150m in the bond market as part of a move to further boost its capital for regu-

At 10.5 per cent, Abbey's overall ratio of capital to assets is already comfortably ahead of most other UK banks. However, the bank said it wanted to raise new capital while it could borrow at favourable rates, rather than risking waiting until it needed the capital.

The £150m of subordinated debt, which is structured to be repaid in 2018, comes at a time when long-term borrowing in the sterling market is scarce. With the gap between shortand long-term interest rates widening, most companies have shifted towards shorterterm borrowings.

Total UK single premium business increased from £1.41bn to £1.97bn, while annual premiums failed to keep up with inflation, rising from £320m to £325m. Mr Peter Nowell, group chief actuary, attributed the single premium rise to increased pension transfer business, caused by people moving jobs or taking early retirement.

Annual life premiums fell from £136m to £126m, but life single premiums more than doubled to £846m. This was almost entirely due to sales of the Prudence Bond, the Prudential's single-premium with-profits bond, which took in £835m.

Mr Roman Cizdyn, an analyst at Smith New Court, said that both pension trans-fers and the Prudence Bond should be more profitable than most single premium products, as it was difficult for customers to surrender the policies. The company's right to make a market value adjustment on pay-outs from the Prudence Bond meant that it should not impose a great capital that it capital strain, he said.

WEEK IN THE MARKETS

Dutch discourage gold business

THE GOLD market is much ounce in London yesterday, off tics and sold heavily. Specula- of the Royal Dutch/Shell more scared of central bank $1.40 on the week. selling and currency fluctuations than anything going on in the Middle East. So said one dealer on the London bullion market, succinctly summing up a week in which Iraq came once again under allied attack and the Dutch central bank revealed it had sold 400 tonnes of the yellow metal worth more than $4bn over the last few months Yesterday gold was fixed in the morning at a fresh seven-year low of $327.45 a troy ounce, reflecting market concern that the Dutch sales, which were equivalent to about 20 per cent of all gold mined in the western world last year, could lead to further selling by other central banks. Between them they have 35,500 tonnes in their vaults, which represents 15 years of production from today's mines.

The Dutch action did not represent a panic sale, but had been taken after several months' deliberation, according to Mr Andy Smith, analyst at the Union Bank of Switzerland. "It was premeditated. It was strategic, not tactical, yet the bank sold when the price was near seven-year lows. The gold market will be asking:

which bank will be next?"

The market reacted to Tuesday's announcement with relief that so much gold had been quietly absorbed. The price moved above $330, but its failure to hold above that level in the face of producer selling is causing concern among chart watchers. Gold closed at $327.85 a troy

The gold market is not alone in being unfazed by Wednes-day's allied attack on Iraq two years ago the mere threat of air strikes against the country was enough to drive oil prices sharply higher. On Wednesday the initial news pushed Brent crude for March delivery up 30 cents, but the market quickly retreated, and the price ended the day unchanged at $17.10 a barrel.

Production disruptions in the North Sea because of the bad weather should also have been bullish for oil Instead, this merely underlined the weakness of the market. Stocks are high, the Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries (Opec) shows little sign of staunching supply, and demand remains depressed.

The Brent price - already down $1 since the beginning of the year - could decline further to $16 a barrel before the mid-February Opec meeting, some analysts predicted. However, yesterday in late trading the March price was at $17.57, ahead 25 cents on the day and 5 cents on the week, not so much because of tension in the Gulf but because of the Middle Eastern tour next week by Mr Alirio Parra, Opec president, in a search for consensus on possible production cuts.

On the London Metal Exchange copper surrendered the gains made last week, when three-month metal was at one stage close to $2,400 a tonne on the back of persistent Chinese buying. But on Monday the Chinese changed tac-

tive liquidation added to the Analysts said further losses were possible, and would not rule out a move to $2,000 a tonne. Last night three-month copper closed at $2,214 a tonne. down $157 on the week.

The turmoil in copper unsettled the other base metals except for aluminium, which has been supported by news of a series of smelter cuts because of power supply problems at the Bonneville Power Administration on the Pacific west coast of America.

A drought in the area has forced the BPA to reduce power supplies to smelters by 25 per cent until the end of next month. There are 10 smelters in the area with a combined capacity of 1.5m tonnes, equivalent to about 10 per cent of western production. So far five have shut down annual capacity totalling about 219,000 000 tonnes.

Analysts suggested that any smelters which made cuts would not restore production for at least six months because of the cost and complexity of shutting down potlines.

However, Mr Angus Mac-Millan, research manager at Billiton-Enthoven Metals, part group, questioned whether the battering, and three-month closures would be sufficient to copper dropped below $2,200 a sustain a price rally when LME stocks were at record levels. He also suggested that the cuts had already been discounted in the price. Inespal, Spain's biggest producer, yesterday announced plans to close one production line at each of two plants for a year, but the news again failed to impress the market.

LME warehouse stocks yes terday rose by a further 12,500 tonnes to 1.6m tonnes. Cash aluminium closed at $1,215 a tonne, up $30.5 on the week.

In London's softs sector cocoa has moved above the key £705-a-tonne level. The mood in the cocoa market appears constructive, partly on chart for mations, partly on talk that Ivory Coast is already well sold, and partly on the high level of grindings reported this week. Yesterday the US fourthquarter grind was announced up 15.3 per cent on the previous fourth quarter at 84.962 tonnes. Earlier in the week the UK fourth-quarter grind was reported 18.7 per cent ahead, while the German grind, which was expected to show a slight fall, was up a surprising 17.7 per cent. Yesterday May cocoa closed unchanged at £728, up £25 on the week, as the market consolidated its gains.

However, robusta coffee yesterday lost most of the gains made earlier in the week. depressed by a sharp fall in early New York trading.

WOLTERS Kluwer, the Dutch publisher, has acquired Liber. Sweden's second largest publishing house, from a group of Swedish institutional shareholders, in a move designed partly to serve as a springboard for expansion into other

The acquisition will be paid for in cash but no further financial details were disclosed yesterday. The acquisition is the first by Wolters Kluwer in Scandinavia and gives it access to its eighth national market in Europe. The purchase will also mean that non-Dutch activities represent around 63 per cent of Wolters Kluwer's business, surpassing a target of 60 per cent which the company had originally hoped to achieve in 1994. Charge to give Dow Chemical loss for year

By Karen Zagor

DOW Chemical, the second biggest US chemicals group, yesterday warned of a disanpointing fourth quarter and unveiled a $430m pre-tax charge against 1992 earnings. The charges are to cover restructuring moves, including job cuts and plant closures. Mr Enrique Falla, Dow executive vice president, said: Business conditions in basic chemicals and plastics con-tinue to remain disappointing, particularly in Europe where margins are negative."

This softness will be reflected in fourth-quarter results, "which we now expect to be weaker than previously expected", he said.

Like much of corporate America, Dow is also adopting new accounting standards. It now expects to post of loss of $1.70 to $1.90 a share for the whole of 1992. In 1991, Dow took special pre-tax charges of $870m which led to a fourth-quarter loss of $94m, or 35 cents a share. For the whole of 1991. Dow earned $935m or $3.46 a

Analysts expect group 1992 fourth-quarter earnings from continuing operations of about 40 cents a share.

Dow said its 1992 special charges reflect asset write-offs and write-downs, plant shutdowns, divestitures and the consolidation of a variety of business activities globally. Costs related to workforce reductions have also been included in the charge.

The company recently announced a management shake-up aimed at creating more flexibility in the management structure and improving international competitiveness.

Henry Birks may seek protection

HENRY BIRKS, Canada's oldest jewellery and giftware chain, is expected to seek protection from creditors while it works out a financial restructuring with outside investors, writes Robert Gibbens from Montreal.

Birks, with 120 retail outlets across Canada and a manufacturing operation, has already pulled out of the US and closed many Canadian stores. The company is understood to have nearly C$100m ($78m) of borrowings.
The recession is mainly responsible for Birks's prob-

Margaretha Ley: designed a German business success story

the core high price labels Escada and Laurel At the heart of the company's success were the clothes designed by Mrs Ley herself and marketed under the Escada label. Flashy, bright, energetic, colourful and expensive, they were at one with the self-confidence and success. The spirit of the age has changed, and the St John Knits clothes - expensive but subdued - are more attuned to a time when the seriously rich do not want to flaunt their spirit of the 1980s, redolent of

It is a measure of the company's difficulties that this profitable and successful business is now up for sale. Ironically though, it is not a falling away in demand for the the current crisis. Analysts say that such clothes have not lost their cachet with women for whom money is no object and the brand is still highly sought It accounted for 41 per cent of group turnover in 1991: details for 1992 are not yet available although the company said last week that group turnover held firm at 1991 levels despite the downturn.

s with many companies in the UK and the US, Escada owes its current troubles as much to the after-effects of over-expansion in better days as the downturn itself. In 1987 it made its first acquisition with the purchase of Schneberger followed by Kemper, a high-quality coat-

David Waller on the fashion house's struggle for survival in the 1990s bought the licence to distribute Cerruti in Germany plus the stake in St Johns Knits. These deals were followed by the purchase of Blusen Neumann in 1991, a company which makes inexpensive blouses and every-day clothes. At the same time, Escada moved into retail, opening a network of boutiques to sell its top products. These shops are thought to contribute DM50m to sales. In 1990-1991, profits fell by 23 per cent, reflecting reduced ales as recession took effect, especially in the US. In the latter part of the last financial year, the downturn finally caught up with the domestic German market, taking management by surprise as the company said last week. The more price-sensitive brands have been particularly badly hit, analysts believe.

Profits were hit by a simultaneous "cost explosion", as the company struggled to integrate its acquisitions. A new logistics centre at Poing near Munich will open this summer, two years later than planned.

The company took steps to remedy the problems - in the last six months appointing two new board members to look after distribution and organisation, and a thorough cost-reduction programme is underway - but this not enough, as last week's statement showed. Further details will be available in a shareholders' circular later this month. It is possible that the company will be able to report a profit for the current year if it holds St John Knitwear on its books to the year-end. In 1993-1994, analysts think the company will be in the red again.

Thus - despite the huge fall in the share price - it could be well into 1994 before the shares once again become fashionable.

Spectra-Physics to sell US subsidiary for $69m

By Christopher Brown-Humes

SWEDEN's Spectra-Physics AB is selling one of its US subsidiaries for $69m in a move aimed at reducing group bor-rowings and focusing more on core business

The purchaser of Spectra-Physics Analytical is the Massachusetts-based group, Thermo Instrument Systems, a specialist in making instruments which are used to detect and monitor air pollution, radioactivity and other substances.

The sale comes two and a half years after Pharos, as known, acquired the US group Spectra-Physics and more than doubled its size.

The group became heavily indebted following the purchase, and a big outstanding dollar loan has increased in krona terms following the Swedish currency's effective devaluation. Spectra-Physics, which is 80 per cent owned by Nobel Industries, specialises in laser technology, microwave technology and industrial measurements. The unit being sold manufactures and sells liquid chromatography analytical instruments and data systems used in quality testing and

Peace breaks out in ERM

THE DANISH krone, Irish punt and French franc appeared well underpinned against the D-Mark yesterday, as tensions inside the European exchange rate mechanism continued to dissipate, writes James Blitz.

At the end of a compara-tively mild week for the ERM, the three currencies at the bottom of the system's grid appeared to be in no danger of an imminent devaluation, despite political uncertainty in their respective countries. Mr Poul Schlüter's resignation as prime minister of Denmark had no impact at all on the krone which was at DKr3.8508 against the D-Mark yesterday afternoon, stronger than Thursday night's London close of around DKr3,646.

The Irish punt remained above its floors against the Dutch guilder and Belgian franc - two of the strongest ERM currencies - in spite of a drastic cut in money market rates by the Irish authorities

this week. The French franc gained more strength against the D-Mark, rising above the FF73.38 level against the German currency, its highest level since November 20.

At Wednesday's meeting in Frankfurt of the privately organised G7 Council, central bankers of countries still in the ERM claimed that the fourmonth crisis in the European Monetary System was past its

But there are reasons for caution.

First, interest rates in several European countries, including France, Denmark and Ireland, remain at high

There were suggestions this week that if the Bank of France does not bring money market rates down from their level of 11% per cent, the higher costs incurred by com-mercial banks may be passed to the retail sector in the next

The Bundesbank will be under more pressure to shave money market rates at its council meetings on 21 Janu-ary and 4 February. If it fails to respond, the pressures on weak ERM currencies could return. There may also be unfinished business in Scandinas whose currencies can have impact on ERM trading. The week has been mar by a sharp fall in the value the Swedish krona, with central bank intervening support of the currency.

The Swedish authorit recently announced that the budget deficit for 1993/4 will 11 per cent of GDP, a another fall for the krona c not be ruled out.

MONEY MARKETS

FORWARD RATES AGAINST STERLING

Big sterling shortage

CASH RATES in the sterling money market were slightly firmer yesterday after the Bank of England announced a large shortage at the start of its money market operations, which is the start of the start writes James Blitz.

The shortage of £2.05bn helped to quash any lingering expectations that the UK authorities might be planning a cut in base rates to coincide with the retail prices index for December.

UK clearing bank base leading rate 7 per cont rom November 13, 1992

The large shortage led to a sharp jump in the cost of borrowing money overnight in the wholesale market, with the rate going as high as 9 per

According to one dealer, this left a few people scrambling desperately for funds. "A few people had got used to easier money, were short of funds and found themselves having to borrow at higher rates than they had expected," he said. As it happened, the RPI figures were generally in line with expectations, although there was some slight disappointment at the increase in the underlying rate to 3.7

This factor, and the tighter liquidity, helped to push 3 month money up by about per cent to a close of 7h per cent. There was more bullishness about a rate cut in the March short sterling futures contract, which rose 2 basis points on the day to close at 93.48.

At this level, it prices 3 month money in March at 6.52 per cent, a level which probably assumes a 50 basis point cut in interest rates over the next two months.

In Europe, the main focus was on the French franc futures market, where the March contract rose by 25 basis points to close at 90.35. The French currency has performed strongly against the D-Mark all week, raising suggestions that the crisis of the French franc may be over. However, 3-month French cash remained high at around 11% per cent, a level which commercial banks may find unsustainable without passing on the higher rates to the retail sector. There were strong suggestions yesterday that the Bank of France might re-open the 5-10 day lending window on position. The German government is due to make an announcement on progress on the solidarity pact talks next week. Growing expectations of a successful outcome helped to push the March Euromark contract up 2 basis points to close at 92.20.

LONDON STOCK EXCHANGE

Rate rise hope overrides inflation fear

By Steve Thompson

SHARE prices ended a busy trading session in positive territory but not before a fierce struggle to shrug off the effects of some slightly disappointing domestic inflation numbers and the absence of a rumoured reduction in UK interest rates. A late rally in the equity market followed a sudden surge of mostly overseassourced buying interest amid suggestions that this weekend could bring a co-ordinated round of Europe-wide interest rate cuts. Significantly, dealers said there had been exceptionally heavy demand for leading French stocks, especially the banks, which they said was a strong pointer to a move to reduce French interest rates.

Sentiment in London was additionally boosted by a healthy performance on Wall Street. The Dow Jones was up around nine points early in the session after a heavy batch of US economic data.

The last session of the account began with marketmakers opening share prices marginally below overnight levels. The Footsie registered an early three-point decline after confirmation of the first relatively sizeable rights issue of the year, a £45m cash call from First National Finance. The absence of any other rights issue saw a burst of buying in the Footsle future which dragged the cash market with it. Then, support tapered ahead of the inflation news.

The marginal increase in the underlying inflation rate was widely expected and put paid to any lingering hopes of a UK rate cut. Subsequent flurries of small selling drove the Footsie to its lowest level, down 9.8 points, just in front of Wall Street's opening. It then began to recover, eventually closing 5.9 higher at 2,765.1. Over the week, the 100 index has fallen 34.1, or 1.2 per cent. The Footsie Mid-250 edged up 2.5 to 2890.6, a fall of 42.1, or 1.4 per cent, on the week. Senior dealers were guardedly optimistic about the nearterm outlook for the market. "The feeling at the close was that perhaps we have seen the worst of the pull-back in equities; the market has a good feel about it," said one trader. But he warned that there remained a strong possibility of a big rights issue hitting the market in the short term.

US broker JP Morgan is among the more bullish of the London market. It sees it outperforming other European markets because it offers real earnings and dividend growth. Strauss Turnbull, however, says the market's earnings multiple of around 17 times discounts too much good news.

Turnover was 611.1m shares yesterday. The value of business on Thursday was £1.2bn. The value of market business has topped £1bn on every trading day so far this year.

L. Ashley slides on US fears

THE MURKY recovery picture among Britain's retailers was further muddied yesterday with two of the smaller high street groups reporting widely different fortunes. Laura Ashley, the clothes and fabrics group, saw its shares fall heavily after revealing a dramatic setback to its US operations in briefings to analysts. It raised fears that the dividend, which was passed at the interims, was unlikely to be paid for the full year. Trading in the US reportedly dropped by up to 40 per cent at one stage in the summer. It is believed that sales have since recovered, while in the UK Laura Ashley told analysts that pre-Christmas sales were about 10 per cent higher than the same period a year ago.

Despite this, analysts moved quickly to downgrade profit forecasts. Kleinwort Benson slashed its figures for 1992-93 from £6m to £2m - only £320,000 more than the £1.68m profits the company made in its first half. The shares tum-bled 17 to 70p. Tie Rack announced sales growth of 6 per cent for the year to date, which would result in substantially increased earnings for the year ending 31 Jan 1993". The shares jumped 11 to 83p.

TSB optimism

High Street bank TSB saw its shares rise on further considermists view held sway. The shares rose 4 to 160p with 10m traded, giving a rise of 8.5 per cent over two days.

Agency broker James Capel was an aggressive buyer of the shares, as was securities house Hoare Govett which has raised its 1993 profit forecast by £20m to £220m. The bull case is that TSB is either a recovery play or a prime takeover target.

However Lehman Brothers, among others, is not con-vinced. The US investment bank says: "We would caution against expecting further significant progress at the operating line ... we prefer the more defensive stocks in the sector, and of the recovery stocks would recommend a switch into Barclays." Barclays, which has its own detractors, was steady at 374p,

Euro Disney boosted

A surprise boardroom change at Euro Disney gave a boost to the shares but did nothing to dispel the bearish view of many UK analysts. The shares added 28 to 778p in thin

The appointment of Frenchman Mr Philippe Bourguignon, currently the theme park's second in command, as chairman raised hopes that the park might develop a more Eurocentric approach, and thus attract more visitors. However, one UK leisure specialist said the appointment made no difference to the fact

highly rated and deserved to be sold down to 400p." Vague takeover talk helped Cadbury-Schweppes to put on 7 to 459p. Hanson was said to be eyeing the confectionery and food group after its failed bid for RHM last year, but analysts were largely dismissive given Cadbury's high rating and solid managerial record. Hillsdown was another name being billed for a bid and the shares added 4 to 148p. Unilever advanced 6 to 1068p on speculation that it will have positive news at meetings it is hosting shares jumped 15 to 772p. The stock advanced for the second day in a row having languished in previous sessions on the back of disappointing traffic figures.

Most of yesterday's buying was said to have been carried out by Swiss Bank Corporation. Mr James Halstead, the transport analyst at SBC said simply: "The shares had been marked down so much and it presented an excellent buying opportunity." Turnover was just short of a million shares by the close. The price of BP shares slipped again on very heavy turnover of 14m shares following a series of profit downgrades and negative broker notes on the oil company. The shares slipped 4 to 228 4p.

Lubricants and chemicals company Burmah Castrol fell 7 to 688p after UBS Phillips & Drew downgraded the company's 1993 profits forecast on growing fears for the German economy.

UBS cut its forecast to £93m from £97m after reducing its expectations for Germany's 1993 GDP from 0.4 per cent to "substantially negative growth". Between 30 per cent and 25 per cent of Burmah's profits are D-Mark-related.

Insurer Prudential closed 9 better at 296p on turnover of 6m as the market responded enthusiastically to announcement that new business increased by 13.3 per cent last year. Mr Charles Landa at Strauss Turnbull raised his forecast for 1993 accruals profits by £100m to £1bn and reinforced his buy stance. Pharmaceuticals group Wellcome saw analysts to discuss the potential benefits of treasury activity but its shares still fell 9 to 915p following overnight declines on Wall Street. The stock consolidated after being pushed up on the previous day on unsubstantiated stories that an encouraging article was about to be published in a medical journal.

Second-line pharmaceuticals Amersham and London International rose 11 to 674p and 5 to 267p respectively on support by Hoare Govett.

Channel tunnel operator Eurotunnel benefited from encouraging comments by French analysts. The shares moved 12 ahead to 389p. NFC gave up 8 to 274p in spite of a series of presentations in the City by the company.

Shares in Lucas Industries, a good market of late on bid speculation, eased 4 to 145p on a combination of profit-taking and a reported profits downgrading by Hoare Govett.

British Aerospace continued to be boosted by reports that it would soon sign a joint venture deal with Taiwan Aerospace over its regional jet division. The shares climbed another 8 to 185p. Smiths Industries put on 3 to 379p. with NatWest Securities reported to have had the main buyer. Broker Albert E. Sharp was said to have shown a keen interest in Glynwed International. The shares hardened 8 to 257p. Shares in First National Finance Corp rose 111/2 to 68p after a positive statement on future trading. The consumer credit group said it should see better results this year despite posting losses for the year to October 31 of £31m. The group also announced a £45.8m rights issue to reduce the company's debt but the news was widely predicted and already in the CONFLICTING signals about a as new figures showing a rise in the underlying rate of inflation were announced, sending March drifting lower.

By 2.30pm it was at the day's low of 2.767 and looked set to fall further. However the firm opening on Wall Street and renewed speculation that there might just be a cut in rates after all, helped the con-

Nordic bourses hopeful after extremes of 1992 Dow volatile But there are reasons why analysts are only cautiously optimistic, Christopher Brown-Humes reports

Wall Street

US SHARE prices were mixed to firmer yesterday morning as the expiration of key stock index options made for a volatile trading session, writes Patrick Harverson in New York

At 1 pm. the Dow Jones Industrial Average was up 6.76 at 3,274.64. The more broadly based Standard & Poor's 500 was 2.46 higher at 438.40, while the Amex composite was up 1.86 at 402.92, and the Nasdaq composite was up 2.68 at 698.38. Trading volume on the NYSE was 173m shares by 1 pm.
The Dow opened slightly weaker, moved to a double-digit gain by mid-morning then dropped back to unchanged levels, before rebounding again soon after midday. After an initial decline similar to the Dow's, secondary stocks posted solid gains across the board, in spite of a setback in technology stocks which had driven the composite index to record highs earlier in the week.

Traders said that the volatile trading was linked to the morning expiration in the Chicago derivatives markets of S&P 500 options and S&P Midcap options. Options on other indices and on some individual equities were due to expire in the afternoon.

The day's most important economic figures were broadly positive for market sentiment. The Labor department announced that consumer prices rose by 0.1 per cent in December, a smaller increase than forecast, although slightly offset by a weaker than expected rise in industrial output.

decline of 10.67 per cent. These, however, are just the local currency figures. A different picture emerges when performance is assessed in dollar terms, highlighting the effect of the devaluations which Finland, Sweden and Norway were forced to carry out last year. On this basis, Sweden dropped 8.6 per cent and Finland by 10.78 per cent, and the falls in both Oslo and Copenhagen were further exacerbated. Common factors were shared by all four markets. These included weak international demand, high unemployment, financial sector problems, falling real estate prices, and generally high interest rates. But whereas bourses in Finland. Sweden and Norway registered ordic stock exchange considerable gains after these strongly in the countries floated their countries cies, Denmark held firm at the price of high interest rates, and share prices suffered accordingly. There were other special factors, such as weak shipping markets, which had a negative influence on both the Norwegian and Danish stock markets but virtually no effect in Sweden and Finland.

In 1993, investors will have to stay selective, particularly in Sweden and Finland where share prices have already rallied strongly over recent months. Most analysts are cautiously optimistic about the outlook in all four countries, although much will depend on what happens to the world economy and domestic interest rates. One important negative influence is likely to be the weakening state of demand in Germany, the most important export market for both Denmark and Sweden

In Denmark, the market's short-term concerns will be political, following Mr Poul Schlüter's resignation as prime minister over the Tamil refugees scandal. But a second Maastricht vote is also looming on the horizon and the hope is that a "yes" vote will be as positive for the market this year as last June's "no" was damaging for sentiment.

In 1992, share prices on the Copenhagen stock exchange never recovered from this blow, although the real damage was done later in the year when currency turmoil forced Denmark to raise its interest rates and competitor countries to devalue. That left Danish put the domestic economy under considerable strain.

There were other negative ing sector, for example, and the collapse of one of the country's main insurers, Hafnia.

This year, financial sector problems are expected to continue, but the corporate sector should benefit from recent restructuring and lower import prices, and domestic demand is expected to pick up.

The biggest worry will be the outlook for exports, if the krona remains at its current revival in 1992, after its poor showing in recent years; but this only manifested itself late in the year, once interest rates started to move down decisively following the decision to float the markka in September.

ment was overshadowed by recession and the banking crisis, helping to drag the Hex index to a five and a half year low of 548 on September 4; after that share prices surged by more than 50 per cent by

While this suggests that the revival may not have much further to go, a number of posi-tive influences are still working in Finland's favour. They include an improving economic outlook - GNP is set to grow by some 1 per cent this year the recent removal of restrictions on foreign share ownership and more equitable tax treatment of capital gains. Stockholm's Affärsvärlden General index, more broadly based than its

FT Actuaries equivalent, ended 1992 at 912, exactly where it Helsinki was due for a began. But that disguised three distinct phases: a rise to 1,000 on May 11; a tumble of 36 per cent by October 5; and a recovery which produced a 42 per cent increase from the bottom by the year-end. The feeling is that the index For much of the year, sentimay struggle to make further headway in the near future, given the dire state of the domestic economy, the continuing banking crisis and the fact that much of the projected rise in profits for the big exporters has already been discounted by recent rises.

A devaluation of just 5 per cent in the value of the Norwegian krone meant the impact on share values in Oslo was less spectacular than in either Stockholm or Helsinki, and the country's total index fell by 10 per cent to 372 during the year. Weak freight markets, which brought the shipping index down 34.9 per cent to 308 in 1992, were a big factor. The banking sector, which took a severe pummelling in 1991, only fell a further 1.1 per cent in spite of its continuing problems, but the insurance sector was depressed by the poor performance and eventual collapse of Uni Storebrand, the country's leading insurer. In 1993, the shipping sector should benefit from a stronge dollar and improved market conditions. It is also expected to be the year in which the long-running crisis in the Norwegian banking sector finally starts to turn. This has left market analysts confident of an improvement in share prices, although they may not materialise until the second half of the year when interest rates should be lower.

Continent firms on hopes of lower interest rates

BOURSES ended the week on a firm note encouraged by the prospect of lower interest rates, writes Our Markets Staff. FRANKFURT's traders saw a chance to reverse the downtrend of the past week and a half, as better than expected figures from Siemens on Thursday lifted sentiment. The DAX index ended 20.81 or 1.4 per cent higher at 1,544.55, 0.9 per cent better on the week.

Turnover rose from DM3.7bn to DM5.2bn. There was some short-covering, but the triple options expiry had little influence on the cash market. Cyclials made the running, with Volkswagen up DM9.50 or 3.7 per cent to DM268.90, Daimler DM12.10 higher at DM550.50 and Thyssen DM4.80 better at

Siemens rose another DM9.70 to DM588.60. In retailing, meanwhile, Douglas extended

Thursday's gains on 1992 sales figures which led Merck Finck, in Düsseldorf, to estimate unchanged earnings of DM32 a share for 1992 and issue a buy recommendation. The shares rose DM20 to DM446.

PARIS rose for a second day on continued domestic and foreign interest. The CAC-40 index ended 23.54 higher at 1,827.08, down 1.3 per cent on the week, in turnover of FFr2.9bn.

Eurotunnel remained attractive to buyers, as the stock out on FFr1.45 to FFr34.15 in the day's heaviest volume of 4.9m shares. Euro Disney rose FFr2 to FFr66 on news of a change in chairman. Matra and Hachette continued to be active on speculation about the terms of their merger. Matra added FFr13.30 to FFr236 while Hachette put on FFr3.55 to FFr90.85.

BA employees protest at 'dirty tricks' affair

By Paul Betts, Aerospace Correspondent, in London

BRITISH AIRWAYS employees have bitterly attacked the compa-ny's handling of the Virgin Atlantic "dirty tricks" affair in the weekly staff newspaper. A series of critical letters pub-lished yesterday in British Airresignation of BA directors and the dismissal of all those respon-sible for the "dirty tricks" campaign against Virgin.

The letters reflected the dismay and demoralisation that has swept the company since BA apologised to Virgin in the High Court on Monday and agreed to pay Mr Richard Branson and Virgin £610,000 in libel damages.

Mr Derek Porter, a priority spares controller at Hatton Cross, wrote that he hoped "the perpetrators of this obscene episode are brought to justice". Those responsible should be instantly dismissed, he added.

Captain Peter Jenkinson, a Boeing 757/767 pilot, argued the was "difficult to believe" He recalled an earlier instance of a director stepping down after accepting responsibility for events of which he had no knowledge at the time. "Surely the same rules apply today and the responsible parties must accept their grave mistakes and take the consequences," he wrote. Mr Gary Moore, a product development co-ordinator, said he hoped "heads will roll" not only of those who planned the malpractice but also of those involved in what appeared to be cover-up attempt

Although some staff wrote to support BA's management led by Lord King, chairman, and Sir Colin Marshall, chief executive and deputy chairman, others said

The news was greeted by a jump in Euro Disney's share price. The shares closed 28p higher at 778p in London and FFr2 higher at FFr66 in Paris.

Euro Disney denied that the departure of Mr Fitzpatrick, 52,

One of the more off-beat tasks he undertook at Disney in the US was dressing up as Goofy, the cartoon dog, and going around the Magic Kingdom theme park. He explained that all Disney employees did a spell in animal costume to meet the public and plans for further property develment around the park because of the precarious state of the Paris property market. This has led to a shortfall in projected capital gains, thereby increasing its financial costs.

Euro Disney recently announced a pre-tax loss of FFr399m for the year to September 30. Analysts expect heavier losses for the current financial year which will, for the first time. include the slack winter months.

Electricity pool to voice concerns over power deal for ICI

By David Lascelles and Andrew Baxter in London

THE UK electricity industry and large power consumers are to relay their concerns to the government over reports that Imperial Chemical Industries may be given special permission to buy electricity at below market rates.

The Energy Intensive Users Group, which includes some of the largest companies in the UK, is to see Mr Tim Eggar, the energy minister, early next week. A spokesman for British Steel, which belongs to the group, said his company wanted to learn more of the government's plans. Members of the electricity pool, the regulated market through which all electricity has to be sold, have decided to write to the Department of Trade and Industry about the reports.

Although the DTI stresses that is believed to be considering a plan to allowing ICI to bypass the pool and buy power direct from a

This could save it up to 20 per cent on its electricity bills. ICI says that unless it can buy power more cheaply, it may have to shut down its chlorine plant in Runcorn, Merseyside, with the loss of 7,000 jobs.

Mrs Margaret Thompson, the pool's chief executive who will be sending the letter, said yesterday that members felt the pool was "a big and complicated issue", and they wanted to ensure that the DTI understood the implications of making an exemption.

The pool's 30 members, representing generators and distributors, are worried that the government could create an unwelcome precedent. They are already under pressure from their customers to match any ICI deal.

The pool was established in the late 1980s, before the privatisation of the electricity industry. Prices are set every half hour throughout the day on the basis of bids placed by power stations.

The price paid by the pool includes charges for running the electricity system and ensuring that enough capacity is available to meet peak demands.

Power sold through the pool also incurs the nuclear levy, adding about 10 per cent to elec-mer chauffeur. Mr Riina is reported to have created many enemies by his rejection of the traditional consensual way of dealing with the main Cosa Nostra clans. Instead, he imposed a bloody dictatorial rule enforced by an army of some 500 gunmen.

Buoyed by the enormous profits from the international drugs trade during the 1980s, he abandoned the old policy of seeking an accommodation with the state, escalating confrontation with schemes for promoting an independent Sicily. The most dramatic instances of challenging the state were the murders of Falcone and Borsellino.

These killings were the catalyst in forcing the authorities to act with greater determination, in turn prompting more people to inform on the Mafia.

The authorities have also begun to arrest politicians in Sicily, seize assets, disband Mafla-controlled municipalities and deploy the army in force. The authorities warned that Cosa Nostra might counterattack violently to remind Italians that the organisation's fate did not depend upon the fate of Mr Riina.

THE LEX COLUMN Winter chills

The UK stock market was always likely to pause for breath early this year after its Christmas sprint, but it has tired more quickly than some expected. Yesterday's news of a 0.1 per cent rise in the underlying inflation rate in December was worse than pre-dicted. Some dispiriting corporate news from normal stalwarts such as Guinness has unsettled sentiment. The market is beginning to twitch at the prospect of the much-rumoured wave of rights issues, to say nothing of concerns over the government's £1bn-a-week borrowing programme. As a result, the FT-SE 100 index has now shed 3 per cent since the beginning of the year. The outlook may be drab for a while to come. One development that might drive it higher is a cut in interest rates. But after yesterday's inflation figures the chancellor may not have the nerve to pre-empt any moves from the Bundesbank. especially since the pound has slipped to DM2.50. Any premature move could put pressure on his inflation targets in the second half of the year.

The one consolation is that bottom-up earnings forecasts from industry sector analysis are more optimistic than the prevailing top-down projections from economists. If the corporate reporting season reveals that the former are right, the market might take heart. In the meantime, the best turnover may come from switching out of the highly-rated recovery stocks into defensive sectors.

Euro Disney

Investors in Euro Disney are hardly paying Mr Robert Fitzpatrick a compliment by marking up its shares some per cent on news of his departure. They could easily be overestimating the significance, though, of what is primarily a symbolic change. Having a French manager at the top, especially one with the business skills of Mr Philippe Bourguignon, may make a difference. The company appears to be signalling a new determination in dealing with the disappointments that have marked its first year of operation. That does not make its problems any less daunting.

There are limits to the extent to which Euro Disney can compensate for lower than expected visitor numbers by cutting costs. Now that the pattern of visitor flows has been established, Mr Bourguignon can perhaps adjust some running expenses accordingly, but he can do little about the high fixed costs including the need to

Even if he succeeds, shareholders may not realise much benefit. The company still faces a large burden of deferred payments to Walt Disney in the US which will be a continuing drag on its share price. But Walt Disney has little incentive to change the arrangements as that would only upset its own shareholders.

Airtours

Airtours may prefer to concentrate on persuading the market of the virtues of its hostile bid for Owners Abroad, but it would be dangerous for it to ignore the pressure building up on the competition policy front. The Monopolies and Mergers Commission has grounds at least to take a look.

After doubling in size following a successful bid, Airtours argues it would be better able to offset the aggressive dominance of the market leader, Thomson. This would bring a better competitive balance to the package tour industry even though the two leaders would control 60 per cent of it. A cartelised market would not develop because of the industry's low barriers to entry and its competitive character.

But the case looks suspicious, given the degree of vertical integration developing. Since Airtours owns the Pickfords travel agency and Thomson owns Lunn Poly, the travel business is starting to resemble the brewers' tie. These two powerful players can push their own brochures through their own travel agencies, at the expense of other operators. Even domestic ones such as Rank, owner of Butlins, admitted this week to a sharp loss of business last summer as a price war raged among package holiday operators.

The MMC might well conclude that the emergence of a strong number two is desirable to temper Thomson. It may refrain from being any more ambitious by its chastening experience of trying to free up pubs. But it is hard to accept that that Airtours' bid for Owners Abroad only affects a limited section of the holiday market.

FNFC

It seems a brazen move on the part of First National Finance Corporation to launch a rights issue after two years of losses which have seen group net assets shrink to £135m from £217m. Nor does it look good for the company that its plans were so widely trailed by the press in advance. The rights issue, which takes the form of convertible preference shares, carries unusually seductive terms, a gross yield of 9.3 per cent and a conversion price actually below last night's close. The immediate assumption could thus be that this is a cynical rescue issue in which shareholders will eventually find the promised resumption of dividends is being paid out of their own money. That would be unfair.

Although the parent company does need to bolster its balance sheet, the consumer credit division at last has a recovery story to tell - witness the turnround from loss of £12.8m in the first half of last year to profit of £8.2m in the second. The risky lending of the late 1980s is being increasingly replaced with new, better quality loans, but - thanks to the absence of competition – margins are holding up. They should increase further in the current year since lower money market rates have reduced the cost of financing fixed rate consumer loans.

Quite how far this will benefit 1992-93 results is hard to predict. There remain considerable problems with the commercial loan division which still has a net loan book of £262m after provisions. About £5m of the second-half consumer lending profits may not recur. The consumer credit division still relies on its ability to securitise its loan book in order to pay off bank borrowings. At least, in its anxiety to ensure success, the company has offered any shareholders who remain nervous rights which they can sell at a profit in the market.

The Soviet heritage is suffering under free market pressures. Gone are the lavish subsidies and the bonds which lent excitement and discipline, pushing performers to the limits of their art, says John Lloyd

USSIAN culture, the envy of the world during the era of Soviet repression, is now critically ill from the effects of freedom. In all the arts for which Russia was famed, the pride of setting international standards has been replaced by despair or cynicism. Already, it is too late to save some parts of the Soviet cultural heritage: for much else, the end

But why should one care about saving the cultural heritage of a brutal regime? Did it not involve censorship of every production and KGB snoopers on every foreign tour, in every cutting room and at every opening night? Yes: but under communist rule the arts were also lavishly subsidised. Standards in music, dance and theatre were kept up and a big effort was made to spread high culture throughout society. The Soviet heritage was unfree but within its political fetters, a culture of great excellence. That duality helps to explain the present crisis and the nostalgia felt by many artists for the lost era of party control.

Under the communist regime, high art was as well rewarded as popular art. Yuri Gussman, head of Russia's Cinematographers' Union and a film director in his native Azerbaijan, says: "Directors making a film for three people were paid more than the directors of the most popular musicals. Some of them were good, some were terrible. Anyway, the market did not matter.'

Now, looking back, it is said that oppression gave energy to those who sought to push their artistic excitement and discipline which today's formless freedom cannot provide.Indeed, before communism. most of Russia's great art was produced under a highly authoritarian system. Arkady Ostrovsky, one of Moscow's brightest young drama critics, says: "Vladimir Visotsky [a famed protest singer of the 1970s who stayed just within the tolerated limits) played Hamlet at the Taganka Theatre. Everyone went to see him because he was saying something about our society. Now, theatre is not shocking and no

Yet, in the first years of Mikhail Gorbachev's glasnost policy, the intelligentsia was delighted by the progressive escape from censorship. In the late 1980s, before the failures economic restructuring were obvious, it was a joy to see one veil after another whipped away: the publication of Anatoly Rybakov's Children of the Arbat [an anti-Stalinist novel written without hope of publication 20 years before]; the performance of extracts of Solzhenitsyn's Gulag Archipelago on a Moscow stage - for which, with a Soviet Foreign Ministry in 1990. It was not easy at first. When the pianist Mikhail Rudy, who defected in 1977 in his mid 20s, came back in 1989 to play with the Leningrad Philharmonic, he found the orchestra "glacial...they had not ever been able to talk to a political exile before, and they were scared". Yet a year ago, he undertook a five-concert tour of Moscow and St Petersburg, as it had become, and Russian cinema. Although much of its output in the Soviet period was banal, it was at least Russian. Now, the cinemas in its capital show almost no Russian films: a recent count of 48 showed only three to be Russian-made; of the rest, 25 were from the US, seven from western Europe, six from Latin America and the rest from other countries.

The films included The Great American Cheerleader Hijack from the US, in which has been football stars kidnap cheerleaders and hold them to ransom; Sex Slaves from France, in which police uncover a crime ring which sells girls to rich Arabs; and Red Heat, also from the US, in which Arnold Schwarzenegger plays a Moscow policeman on the trail of Georgian drug smug-glers with the help of a Chicago cop.

brated of the contemporary Russian film makers is Stanislav Govorukhin, for his two long documentary films This is no Life and The Russia we Lost alternately lyrical and angry evocations of a wonderful past and a diseased present. Yet The Russia We Lost played in one small cinema in Moscow this summer after its release, and then disappeared,

Govorukhin's work, nostalgic and nationalistic, points to one direction for the arts in modern Russia - an attempt to rediscover the old Russian culture which was overlaid by the Soviet orthodoxy and is now being hounded into minority enclaves by commercial pressures. It is music, however which is in the worst predicament. Russian musical talent, especially planists and violinists, dominated 20th century concert halls. Most of the artists passed through the legendary Moscow Conservatoire - a place of frighteningly high standards and mystical discipline, where the best teachers led lives of deliberate obscurity, the finest of them never performing in public and eschewing a concert career for the craft of burg, going through Heifetz, Janke-levich, Perelman. [Laruissa] Glazaraova (still at the Conservatoire) was my teacher and she was one of the last greats. Now you can buy your way in and buy your way on, now you give a video recorder to the teacher to persuade him to take you. It is all lost."

Yuri Rozum, a Russian pianist now becoming internationally known after a period in which the KGB prevented him from travelling,says: "There is a Russian school of piano and violin teaching which is quite distinctive. It set a standard. There is no question it is getting less distinctive now. We are losing our people abroad".

Rozum spends more time on the German and Italian circuits, although his home is a self-built dacha just outside Moscow, to which he commutes in a Mercedes. Some of this is simply Russia entering into world show business with stars moving freely between the great stages. But it also repre-sents a loss for the country, since the great stages of Russia are impoverished. The few stars who visit Russia are either emigres returning for a dewy-eyed tour, such as the Moscow Virtuosi, who now live in Spain, or foreigners coming for free. A recent newspaper article congratulated the Austrian pianist Leonid Brumberg, the Spanish guitarist Carlos Trepat and the Israeli conductor Itai Talgam for appearing "without demanding high fees in hard currency".

But many who do come find as much chaos in the new artistic world as in Russia's politics and economics. What should have been last summer's premier event, a grandly conceived operatic pageant in Red Square lasting a week, turned into a fiasco. It was badly-organised, ill-attended and over-policed. Resentful Moscovites glared into a square one-quarter filled with foreigners barely attending to such superstars as Jose Carreras, Marvlin Horne, Leo Nucci and Margaret Price. Omari Sokhadze, who conceived the venture, is still disputing the costs with the Russian and Moscow city governments.

Ride down Gilt Mountain

YOUR UK edition of the

The New Year started badly in the securities markets in London, with profits being taken in equities and longdated gilt-edged yields climbing back up to 9 per cent as the announcement of next week's gilt auction has provided an early reminder of the coming flood of paper. On the other hand yesterday's drop in the inflation index to 2.6 per cent, though entirely dependent on falling mortgage rates, gave a reminder of the kind of short-term opportunities that the politicians will be able to exploit this year.

Meanwhile, the pound sterling has bounced firmly off $1.50 at the beginning of the month, and sterling has been able to watch the latest round of speculative pressure on the European exchange rate mechanism from a distance. The ERM has survived, because the markets are now discounting a significant cut in German interest rates this year; the French franc need not be devalued against the D-mark because the D-mark has depreciated by 15 per cent against the dollar since the height of the currency crisis last September.

From the British point of view the danger is that gains in competitiveness in Continental markets might be significantly eroded, which could be awkward now that recovery has become the main official economic objective. Although there is some nervousness in official quarters about cutting interest rates again so soon, before the response of the economy can be properly judged it is just two months since base rates dropped to 7 per cent - this is a card which Lamont will want to play, possibly in his March 16 Budget.

The big financial problem, remember, is that the government will need to sell £50bn or more of gilts in the 1993-94 financial year. This is more than can be readily financed out of regular savings flows within the British economy so there will have to be some reliance on shifts in holdings of existing financial assets, and on investment by foreigners. In a catastrophic scenario the Bank of England would be raising gilt yields to whatever level was required to entice pension funds into dumping equities, but fortunately we are a long way from that 1970s-type crisis point. All the same, it looks increasingly inevitable that Norman Lamont will have to resort to escape route one, a switch to underfunding. This is jargon for saying that the government will finance part of its deficit through the banking system. Essentially the banks will shift a proportion of their assets into the public sector: at present British banks have only 3 per cent of their portfolios in public sector assets, whereas in the US, where the government has been underfunding like crazy, the banks have 22 per cent.

scape route two is likely to be a low level of short-term inter-est rates. Six months ago long-term rates were lower than short rates, now they are two percentage points higher, and the bigger that gap becomes the easier it will be to sell gilts. Low interest rates will also serve to weaken sterling which is important if substantial sales are to be made to foreigners: they will not buy gilts unless they are convinced that sterling is at a bargain basement level from which it is more likely to rise than to depreciate further. Alternatively the government could borrow in foreign currencies, but that would only highlight the lack of confidence in the pound.

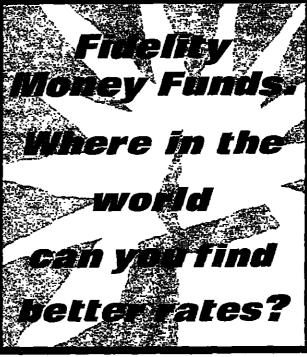

There are important limitations on the scope for cutting sterling interest rates, however. Already the building societies are tending to suffer a net loss of savings and they surely could not follow money market rates down much below 6 per cent. The banking sector became bloated through high deposit rates in the 1980s but could be nastily squeezed by low rates now - although it would be open to the building societles to finance mortgage lending through longer-term savings products. While instant access accounts might vield little, five-year fixed-rate bonds could offer a lot more. But this does not look like a year in which it will be much fun running a building society.

amont's third escape route could be through tax increases. Lenders are much happier when they think the borrower does not really need the money - but nobody wants to lend to a desperate man. Above all, the gilt market will want to be able to see a way in which the budget deficit can shrink in 1994-95. In any case, fiscal tightness is an appropriate counterweight to monetary relaxation.

This government will not increase income tax, as it probably should, but a temporary dip in the headline inflation rate in the early part of this year would give a window for an extension of the coverage of value added tax. The sins of the press could be punished at last; and those children's clothing lobbyists had better polish up their heartstring-plucking arguments. So the Treasury's escape committee should have reasonable scope for initiatives this year. The funding require ments are demanding, but we start from the relatively strong position of an historic government debt burden of only 36 per cent of GDP: this is nothing like Italy, where the corresponding figure is over 100 per cent. The trouble is, each tactical shift could weaken the room for manoeuvre in the longer term. In particular, there is no anti-inflationary anchor now that we have left the ERM, in last year's death-defying policy switch. You need to be smart and lucky to be a successful escapologist. And even Harry Houdini turned out in the end to have a soft underbelly.

Any stock market trader worth his red braces had got hold of a faxed transcript of the purported royal telephone conversation this week. All were instant experts on who said what to whom. Yet no-one seemed to know what was really happening to interest rates, to corporate rights issues, or to fiscal policy.

Throughout the week all three were the subject of persistent rumours. Base rates were set to fall on Friday, so the gossip went; a large rights issue was due at any moment: the government might – or might not – raise value added tax in the budget, widen the VAT base, cut back on income

By the end of the week there had been no cut in interest rates, and only one new rights issue, raising £46m for First National Finance. The outlook for taxes remained shrouded in mystery. The only new fact available was the date of the Budget, March 16.

The outlook for interest rates emed particularly unclear. Although the government had been signalling for some time that an immediate cut in rates was unlikely, traders convinced themselves that one was possible on Friday.

They were reinforced in this view by the recent strength of sterling - in the early part of the week it was still healthily above DM 2.50, well above its post-Black Wednesday lows and by short-term movements in the money markets, where the overnight rate fell to as low as 3 per cent at one point.

Friday came and went, however, with base-rates firmly stuck at 7 per cent. That was not the only bad news. Sterling had weakened to below DM 2.50 for the first time since the very first days of the year. Worse, new inflation statistics appeared to limit the government's freedom to make such a

The figures for the retail orice index in December, published at Friday lunchtime, contained the expected healthy inflation rate, which fell to 2.6 per cent, the lowest rate since the summer of 1986.

The rate the government is watching, however, is the underlying one, calculated by leaving out the drop in mortgage interest payments. This was much less encouraging. It rose 0.1 per cent in December to 3.7 per cent, ominously near the the government's target ceiling of 4 per cent.

Not only does this make an immediate cut in short-term interest rates less likely, it also has worrying implications for long-term rates.

Investors alarmed at the size of likely public-sector borrow-ing this year have been pinning their hopes to a Budget which does something to close the gap between what the government takes in and what it spends. One talked-about measure is a higher rate of VAT -

A move of either sort on a scale large enough to be much help to government finances, would be likely to push inflation over its target ceiling in the second half of 1993. Friday's inflation figures help close off this revenue-raising option, making the threat of an uncontrollable rise in public borrowing more real.

The gilt market had had an unpleasant reminder of that fact earlier in the week, thanks to Tuesday's announcement of a gilt auction. This long-expected news served to concentrate the worriers' minds, and the yield on the long-term gilt rose to 8.83 per cent, a rise of a quarter of a percentage point in six trading days.

By Friday, despite the poor inflation news, gilts had recovered slightly, with the yield on the long gilt finishing the week at 8.77 per cent. Next week's performance will turn on the December public sector borrowing figures, due on Tues-

Fixed-interest investors will not be the only people watching that number closely. Finance Directors eager to raise cash will be keen to get their rights issues away before the flood of government paper

Though there have as yet been no unexpected large issues, the market is apprehensive that they are on the way. Two making headlines this week - the Lonrho issue. which closed on Friday, and the FNFC issue announced the same day - were scarcely favourable auguries.

As intended, large investors stayed away from the Lonrho issue in droves, leaving the way clear for Dieter Bock, the German property entrepre-neur, to become the group's largest shareholder. The FNFC issue of convertible preference shares, a rescue operation, came as the consumer credit company announced a £32m pre-tax loss for the year.

This, at least, was fact rather than rumour. So were some intriguing figures calculated by the London Stock Exchange, and summarised in the chart. They show that a handful of big companies are an important cause of the slide in the FT-SE 100 index from its high of 2861.5 on January 4, 1993 to the 2,765.1 recorded at 2.6 per cent, so it may seem an odd time to be extolling the virtues of index-linked gilts. But their appeal to the private investor is three-fold. The first attraction is that inflation might rise, whatever the views of the pundits. Traditionally, devaluations of the pound and high budget deficits have led to higher prices eventually.

The second is that, even if inflation does stay low, the "real" returns (the nominal returns minus inflation) offered by index linked gilts may look attractive. Currently long-dated indexed issues offer real returns of between 3.5 and four per cent

The attractions are increased by their tax efficiency. Much of the return from an indexlinked gilt comes in the form of tax-free capital gain. There is a small income - two or 2.5 per cent - on most issues. But this means that even top-rate taxpayers will pay a maximum of one per cent in tax per annum.

So, assuming inflation averages four per cent, an indexlinked issue with a real yield of 3.7 per cent offers the prospect of a net return of 6.7 per cent a year to the top-rate taxpayer. A building society would have to pay 11.2 per cent gross to offer an equivalent return.

What about conventional gilts as an alternative? It is possible to work out a break-even level inflation rate, above which index-linked issues will be more attractive than conventional gilts.

Graham Cox, economist at Sun Life, says these calculations make index-linked issues look very attractive. For toprate taxpayers, Greenwell Montagu shows the break-even inflation rates as 1.62 per cent for the 2001 issue; 1.6 per cent for 1998; 1.24 per cent for 1996; and minus 0.4 per cent for the 1994 issue. Most economists would expect inflation to be higher than those rates. So why are these highly more common part of inves-tors portfolios? One problem is that, though simple in concept, index-linked gilts are fiendishly complicated in practice. The value of your investment does not go up in line with inflation every year.

All that is certain for the investor is that the repayment value of the gilt on maturity will reflect the increase in the retail prices index since issue. Similarly, the dividend will go up in line with the RPI each half-vear.

But the price of the gilt is set by supply and demand; so if investors think that inflation is going to be low, and sell indexlinked gilts, the price will fall. Index-linked issues will then trade, as they do now, below their theoretical value.

his makes them more attractive to new investors buying at current prices. Instead of the two per cent or 2.5 per cent above inflation that such gilts offered on issue, they now offer real returns of 3.5 per cent plus.

What makes pricing specially difficult is the eight month "gap" in indexation. Rather than use the RPI figures for the month of issue and maturity, the Bank of England calculates indexation on the basis of the RPI eight months before issue and maturity. This is administratively easier for the Bank but is a lot more difficult for everyone else.

The consequence of the gap is that investors are left without inflation protection for the last eight months of the issue. So the higher the expected inflation rate, the lower the real return on index-linked.

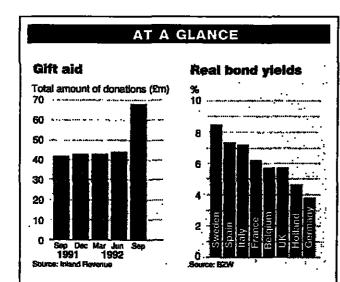

This has a particular effect on short-dated issues since the eight-month gap is a large pro-portion of the time till maturity. The FT, for example, shows real yields on the basis of five per cent, and 10 per cent, expected inflation. On NFLATION has fallen to attractive investments not a Friday morning, the 1996 issue had a real yield of 2.85 per cent on the former basis, but only 2.18 per cent on the latter. For the 2020 issue, the yields were 3.94 per cent and 3.82 per cent respectively.

An example of how indexation works in practice might help. The base RPI for the 1996 issue is 67.9 (the figure for July 1980) and if the issue were redeemed today, the relevant index would be April's 138.8 (both figures are given on the FT prices pages, under British funds). Dividing the latter by the former gives 2.044, so an investor who bought £1,000 of stock on issue would be repaid £2,044. The actual price on Friday morning, however, was 194%. So the market value of the investor's holding would be £1,947.50. The original coupon of two per cent, or £20, would now have more than doubled to around £41 a year.

If inflation averages five per cent between now and the repayment date of September 1996, then the final repayment value should be around £2.380 (indexation only occurs until January 1996). So someone buying £1,000 of the stock now. would have around £1,223 on maturity; plus an income of just over two per cent a year. For the 2.5 per cent 2001 issue, the repayment date is September of that year. If inflation averages five per cent between now and then, someone buying £1,000 of stock would get around £1,645 on maturity, and a taxable income of a little over 2.5 per cent a year in the interim. These are not spectacular gains (and indeed inflation could be lower than five per cent); in the short term, there is always the risk that indexlinked prices might fall (especially if the government floods the market with new issues). But the prospect of tax-free profits from the government ought to make many investors holding in their portfolios.

Sharp rise in charitable giving through Gift Aid Gift Aid, the scheme which allows tax-efficient single donations to charity, took off in the third quarter of last year, according to figures issued this week by the Inland Revenue, Donations from individuals increased from £25m in the three months to the end of June to £37.9m, while corporate donations rose from £19.2m to £30.1m.

Average individual donations rose from £1,764 to £2,073, which suggests that the move cannot be accounted for by the cut in the minimum donation allowed under the scheme from $$\infty 0$ 00 to $$\infty 0$ 400.

The figures are included in the latest edition of The Outline Guide to Charitable Giving and to Establishing Charitable Gift Trusts, published by Investment and Tax Publishing Services (tel: 0234 218740), which gives full details of the scheme. Price £48 (£42 until February 26).

why the US stock markets reacted so indifferently this week to the news that Allied warplanes had bombed Iraq, it was that investors were too busy kicking up a storm in the technology sector to notice.

The huge gains earned by computer and related technology stocks this week have energised Wall Street, fuelling talk that semiconductor and software companies are rapidly becoming the new bellwethers of the market. A futures trader in Chicago said on Thursday that Intel and Microsoft had replaced General Motors and IBM as the best indicators of market performance.

Given that Intel and Microsoft have come from nowhere in the last decade to challenge IBM's position as the company with the largest market capitalisation in the US, and that both stocks are traded on Nas-daq's electronic dealer-driven market and not on the New York Stock Exchange, traditional home to the nation's blue-chips, the US equity mar-kets appear to be undergoing a quiet revolution.

FINANCE AND THE FAMILY

The threat to interest relief on mortgages

UST two years after Norman Lamont, the chan-cellor, abolished higher rate tax relief on mortgage interest, speculation is mounting that the sacred cow of Miras, mortgage interest relief at source, might again be under threat.

With a public sector borrowing requirement approaching £37bn this financial year, and expectations that it might top 250bn in 1993-94, there is no shortage of guesses about the measures the government might take to reduce it

The cost of Miras to the government has been falling but it is still expensive. It is expected to cost the Treasury £5.2bn this year, down from £6.1bn in 1991-92. The fall is a reflection of the sluggish housing market and the lowering of interest rates last year. In 1990-91, the last year of marginal rate tax relief, the cost of Miras peaked at £7.7bn.

Miras has been criticised for being an inefficient subsidy since it is applied at a flat rate to all borrowers, regardless of financial position.

It has also been blamed for helping to keep house prices high. But two measures have watered down the distortionary effects on the housing market. The first was the £30,000 ceiling on loans, increased from £25,000 in 1983 but not raised since. This was followed in 1991 by the abolition of higher rate tax relief. The announcement that dual mortgage tax relief would be abolished in 1988 was highly inflationary but its disappearance has now helped to reduce the importance of Miras to home

Nevertheless, experts believe that abolishing Miras might have a disastrous effect on confidence in the housing market, unless it were accompanied by other measures, for example encouraging first-time buyers.

There are 9.7m people who benefit from Miras. The greatest number – 5.8m – earn between £10,000 to £25,000. None would welcome, but many could afford, to lose the existing relief - £637 a year on a £30,000 mortgage - particularly if it were phased out rather than removed in one go.

Those who would be most affected by abolition are at the hottom end of the market. The lan Darby, of mortgage brokers John Charcol, says that this could make the difference between buying or renting for prospective first-time buyers.

Michael Shaw, chief executive of Britannia building society and chairman of the Building Societies Association, agrees. "I would rather the government left Miras untouched because in the present state of the market, any At current rates of interest, changes could be disruptive," there is little difference he said.

might tilt the balance again against buying. Those at the middle and top end of the market are reliant on the bottom end to get the chain moving."

Estate agents have been reporting increased activity in December and January. David Goldsworthy, president of the National Association of Estate Agents, says that it would not be helpful of the government to abolish Miras when such interest has just started to pick

"House prices would fall and it could make the negative equity situation worse," he

Mindful of the possibility of such an effect, there have been a number of suggestions to change Miras but to use the the savings to galvanise the bottom end of the market.

Halifax, the UK's largest lender, has suggested raising the ceiling for first-time buyers only. The extra relief could then be phased out over a number of years. But this measure might still prove more costly than the existing system unless mortgage relief was withdrawn from other borrowers: Halifax suggests phasing out tax relief for existing owner-occupiers.

However, there is concern about penalising those who already have mortgages. "We would want existing borrowers to be protected," said Adrian Coles, of the Council of Mortgage Lenders.

"We are in deep recession with high arrears and repossesinterest at 8.5 per cent on a to make existing mortgages

"It didn't create more sales -it just bunched them up. There was a rush of activity and then the market went dead," said Paul Burgin, of Abbey National, the second largest lender. "We welcome moves to help the housing market but not short-term measures that

John Wriglesworth, building society analyst at UBS Phillips and Drew, is another critic of Miras but thinks that withdrawing it without a substitute would cause psychological damage to a stagmant market. His idea is to withdraw Miras but give instead a lump sum grant of £3,000-£4,000 to all house buyers to encourage movement in the market.

In order to avoid the stamp duty syndrome, when buyers rushed to complete before the tax was reimposed last August he says the government should not announce the suspension of the lump sum payment long in advance. But it could be removed once the housing mar-ket started to pick up. Daniel Dorling, housing research fellow at the University of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, regards Miras as a waste of money. "The problem with Miras is that only a small prowho need the relief. It doesn't help young buyers. It is a badly-targetted, inefficient sub-

How does Miras work?

MIRAS IS effectively a subsidy to those who take out a mortgage to buy a home. The mortgage holder gets tax relief on the interest he pays for the loan, but there is a ceiling on the size of the loan eligible for tax relief — currently £30,000. The amount of relief is also limited to 25 per cent even for top-rate taxpayers.

If you were to take out a mortgage for £30,000 at an interest rate of 8.50 per cent the amount of interest you would have to pay for a year would be £2,550. Tax relief at 25 per cent on this amount would be £637.50. So the total interest you would pay would be £1,912.50.

The tax relief for someone taking out a £100,000 mortgage would still be £637.50 because of the £30,000 ceiling on the size of the loan. Higher rate taxpayers cannot claim any extra relief.

In 1983, the way in which the tax relief was applied changed to become mortgage interest relief at source (Miras). The borrower pays interest net of the basic rate relief and the lender reclaims the tax relief from the inland Revenue. Before the change, relief was given by tax offices through tax assessments.

Building a retirement nest egg done much more effectively, and more cheaply, if the discipline comes from the saver and not the insurance company. That means using single premium pensions, rather than the more heavily sold and arguably more convenient regular premium contracts.

At this time of year, people with an irregular income will normally start to put some of it into a personal pension. This is most administratively simple if the pension is a regular premium arrangement, where you have contracted in advance to make fixed payments at fixed intervals. The other big advantage of this method is "pound-cost averaging". By saving regularly in small amounts, the prob-lem of timing is avoided, and, if the market is turbulent, then at least some of the premiums will be paid when values are at their cheapest.

If you opt to buy a single premium pension each year, you will need to do so between January and March. But James Higgins of Chamberlain De ties. The standard stock market saw is to "sell in May and go away".

So regular premiums might be better for the totally unsophisticated. However, there are limits to this investment argument. Firstly, single premiums allow the investor to choose a different manager each year, diversifying risk, and spreading expertise. Diversification is, if anything, even more desirable than pound-cost averaging.

Taking the pension on retirement could get very difficult if too many companies are used. But using five or six fund managers, rather than one, for managing pension funds, can only increase the security of the final retirement income.

Then there is the fact that, in the words of John Cole, of Berry, Birch & Noble. "a pension is no more than an investment which has tax advantages and also tax restrictions". It should be treated, he says, as a part of a wide portfolio of investments.

As pensions justifiably cost more to and then face stiff penalties.

ETIREMENT saving for the self-employed takes discipline. But it can be discipline ally the best time to invest in equilar savings through another vehicle. and topping up annually with single premium pensions where necessary. For example, regular savings into a unit or investment trust Pep provide much the same investments as a per-sonal pension. Contributions are not

> John Authers reports on single premium pensions for the self-employed

"grossed up" when they are paid in, but the final payout can be taken at any time and is more tax-efficient than a pension payout. Those who do not opt for a Pep saving scheme might still take out a regular premium pension plan for a relatively small amount. This limits the danger that you will be unable to keep up with a high regular premium.

This is the approach recommended by David Harris of Chantrey Vellacott. He says: "In general, I would attempt to encourage individuals to pay around 25 per cent of their total annual contributions by regular premiums and then undertake a fuller, additional planning exercise to use up as much of their total retirement liets as possible each year." Personal pensions come in almost as broad a range of sectors and investments as unit trusts, so this allows enthusiastic investors the chance to make some imaginative choices. It is the expense which makes single premiums better for most people. Typically, the commission on a £100 per month regular contract works out at 2540, while for a 25,000 single pre-mium it would be £260 - you would need to pay regular premiums a long time to counterbalance this.

The "allocation rate" plays an important part of this - this refers to the proportion of premiums paid which are actually put towards providing retirement benefits. According to Harris, with regular contributions, allocation rates for an initial period (usually one or two years) are between 50 and 70 per cent. After that, around 95 per cent will go towards benefits. This can increase to more than 100 per cent for young lives, or for large contributions (Harris suggests £500 per month or more). By contrast, single premium contributions under £5,000 usually have between 95 and 97 per cent allocation rates, according to Harris, and this can rise to 105 per cent for contributions of £15,000 or more. Other charges to watch out for on regular premium contracts are the standard bid-offer spread - almost always five per cent - plus annual management charges and flat plan charges.

Cole identifies one typical client for whom single premiums are always preferable - the person who takes early retirement and then continues to work on a freelance or consultancy basis. Both the level of income each year from such an arrangement, and the timespan before the client wants to start drawing the pension are unknown, so a regular premium policy cannot be justified.

Yorkshire Tyne-Tees, the merged ITV company, should announce pre-tax profits of about £17.5m for the year to September, with two months included from Type Tees. This would be a little below original estimates of about £19m, but still a solid base to begin tack. ling its new franchise.

Anxiety about the preference dividend at Kunick, the fruit machines to nursing homes group, seems set to prove unfounded at the announcement of the annual results on Wednesday. Forecasts are for a pre-tax loss of about £3.5m, after some £6m of exceptionals against a profit of £12.4m. The seasonality of Park Food Group's main business (selling Christmas hampers) means it regularly reports pre-tax losses at the interim stage. A smaller first-half deficit is expected to be announced on Friday, down from £4.4m to £4m.

Demand continues for fixed-rate mortgages

IXED-RATE mortgage offers continued to be issued this week to satisfy increased demand while interest rates

Anne Gunter, of National Westminster bank's mortgage services, says nearly half the bank's customers chose a fixed-rate mortgage last year. The bank has launched three more fixed rate offers, which apply to endowment and pension mortgages only.

The choice is between a fix of 7.99 per cent until February 28 1995, one at 8.69 per cent until the end of February 1997 or 9.29 per cent until February 29 2000. All carry a fee of £250. The redemption penalties are two months, three months and six months respectively.

Halifax has issued three new short-term fixed rates, two of which are aimed at first-time buyers. They can choose to pay 6.5 per cent fixed until October 31 1994 if they borrow up to 90

Diary of a Private Investor/Kevin Goldstein-Jackson

When to say 'yes' to BES

VEN THOUGH the Goat Advisory Bureau wished the venture "every success", Angora International – a Business Expansion Scheme - became a butt for jokes as it was not a success. Fortunately, I did not have an investment in it.

Over the years I have resisted the tax temptations of a wide variety of business expansion schemes, including one, Unicorn Heritage, which offered the opportunity of "the chilling sensation of walking down the corridor with Mary Queen of Scots on the way to her execution." Instead, Unicorn got the chop as its business failed.

I did, however, invest in a small number of BES companies and although, taking tax considerations into account, I have made a profit, I will not be mourning the ending of

(献 もこり) しなごなでき

In his budget last year, the Chancellor, Norman Lamont, announced that BES will "come to an end" on December 31, 1993. According to the chancellor's statement, when BES was first introduced "the venture capital industry was in its infancy of 75 per cent (when high-rate taxand there was concern that the investment needs of small firms were not well understood and pro-

However, he said Britain "now has a venture capital industry the payers like me started investing in such schemes in 1983/84) there seemed to be too few attractive manufacturing companies available in which to invest.

Nearly all of my BES investments

'I have resisted the tax temptations of a number of business expansion schemes'

equal of that anywhere in the world outside the US. But the provisions of the Business Expansion Scheme have become ever-more complex. And nowadays only a small part of the total invested goes to small

This latter comment has, to me. been the saddest feature of the schemes. Vast sums were poured into property-backed ventures rather than into new and innova-

ing period for tax-free capital gains and their sponsors have provided various "exit routes" for investors. For example, I invested in the 1983/84 Britannia BES Fund which backed a range of companies. including three which went into receivership. But some of its investments performed much better, especially the fund's £61,270 investment in Graham Wood, a structural steel have reached the end of the qualifyfabricator, which produced a return of £602,900.

By the time the Britannia scheme had disposed of all of its investments and wound-up the fund (in 1991) investors who had been in the highest rate tax bracket had received a return of more than 290

In 1985, I invested in Hotel Apartments, a BES company sponsored by Johnson Fry. The shares, before tax relief, cost me £1 each. The company sold its hotels and I received a payment of £1.06p a share in September 1991 and a further 2p per share in December last year.

While I am quite pleased to see the end of this investment, I am sorry that my involvement with another BES company, Perry Publications (Holdings) has ended. I invested in Perry in 1987 because I very much enjoyed reading the monthly magazine which it produced: Business Traveller. I thought it was the best magazine of its type on the market

Unfortunately, the world of publishing is tough and so the company felt in need of a partner which could strengthen its financial resources and enable it to expand. Thus, Motor-Press International Verlagsgesellschaft Holding, part of a German publishing group, made an offer to acquire investors' interests in the company. I accepted their offer. For each share in Perry Publications which cost me £1, ignoring tax relief, I received 43p in November last year and will receive a further 42p per share in March wish there had been some other way in which Perry Publications (Holdings) could have raised additional funds in order to develop Business Traveller so that I could have retained a small financial interest, as I remain convinced of the publication's potential in the UK and US and would have liked to have shared in the future profits -

but without being locked in. But, then, that has always been one of the problems with BES companies: those you wish to escape from you find yourself locked in for longer than anticipated whereas it is impossible to have a long-term relationship with companies where it is desirable.

I hope that, in splte of the demise of the BES, small companies will still seek funds for expansion from private investors and will not rely on institutional investment. Perhaps, in his next budget, the Chancellor could announce the DTI spon sorship of a "sorting house" which would match private investors with small companies seeking to raise funds for expansion - and provide this service at no cost to the companies and investors concerned.

BES set to grow

HE Business Expansion Scheme could be about to expand, even though few schemes are on the market.

Investors should be pleased with this because the delay has been caused by stiff competition between sponsors trying to tie up deals with universities and housing associations. They are now being forced to go through "beauty parades", and as a result sponsors' fees are coming down.

Speculation over another fall in base rates has also held up plans. If rates do fall from seven per cent, many of the institutions underwriting the schemes will want to cut the returns on offer to investors after the five-year tax exemption period for BES investments has closed.

It is not clear how many institutions are going to use the BES to convert housing which they have repossessed into assured tenancies. BES makes it easy for banks to lessen the damage of bad loans on their balance sheets, but as yet no building societies have converted repossessions using the BES. Several are discussing this, and if they do so then the supply of products should be substantially increased.

Non-recourse loans, which allow investors to exit from the investments after six months, have made it much easier to sell the scheme to customers, and so many companies with reputations in other investment markets may now launch into the BES.

The bottom line for investors is that there should be enough money to go around, and it would be unwise to rush for the first scheme which appears, or to be disheartened if attempts to buy into a BES so far this tax year have been unsuccessful.

this week is City North 3. It has no "guarantee", but will aim to make as high a return as possible, with no upper limit. The company will invest in rental accommodation.

Another side of life

ORE LIFE offices announced their with-profit bonuses this week. The most interesting figures come from two companies which do not do much business through brokers. Their results seem to strengthen claims that earlier pay-outs from other offices have not been supported by investment results, but were aimed at drumming up new business. Royal National Pension Fund for Nurses, which specialises in products for the health care professions, saw ten-year pay-The one new BES scheme outs decline by 3.0 per cent from £7,943 to £7,705 (assuming £30 premiums per month were paid by a policyholder aged 29 at the outset). This is the highest ten-year figure yet announced, overtaking £7291 from Tunbridge Wells Equitable. The lowest pay-out, from Guardian Royal Exchange, is

For 25-year policies, pay-outs have increased by 4.7 per cent to £63,680, the second highest John Authers pay-out yet announced.

RNPFN expects to pay £28m in maturities this year, of which more than 90 per cent are for ten-year policies.

Royal London, a "home service" company which does not deal through brokers, also announced a high ten-year pay-out, which fell from £7,628 to

John Authers looks at the latest with-profits bonuses

£7,323 using the same assumptions. Its 25-year pay-out remains unchanged at £63,797. This will drop to £62,014 on February 1. Royal London uses a slightly different bonus system from most of the industry, and these figures are an interim position. A further valuation will be made at the end of March, and new maturities will apply from the beginning of May. Unlike offices such as Norwich Union and Sun Alliance, Royal London does not have to cope with a big bulge of ten-year maturi-ties this year - ten-year payouts account for 23 per cent of ordinary branch business up from 21.5 per cent. For the industrial branch, the figures are 20 per cent, following 15 per cent.

Scottish Mutual, which is owned by Abbey National, kept reversionary bonuses unchanged, but cut interim bonuses which will apply during the next year. This led to a 4.7 per cent cut in ten-year payouts, down to £6,613, but a slight increase in 25-year maturity values from £54,787 on the last relevant date to £55,107.

NPI, a pensions specialist office, announced substantially reduced bonuses. On pensions policies, the cuts concentrated on reversionary or annual bonuses, to reflect its reduced expectations for investment returns. The effect is cuts of around 6 per cent in pay-outs for regular premium pension plans, but this varies according to the term of the policy.

BRITISH Bio-Technology came to the market in June last year as a highly-rated pharmaceutical research and development company. The company is making losses and those are forecast to rise during this year and next as research costs increase. Dr Keith McCullagh, chief executive, sold 100,000 at 435p leaving himself with 800,000 shares. At the same time Dr John Gordon exercised an option over 100,000 shares and sold 50,000 of them at 435p. That takes his holding to 51,000. Reports of strong trading in December boosted shares in the motor sectors and Pendragon, the up-market car dealer, is no exception - the shares have outperformed by over 30 per cent during the last month. The four key executives, including the chairman and chief executive, have sold a total of 370,000 shares at 242p. Nigel Rudd, the chairman, sold 25.000 shares at 222p towards the end of December.

George Robb's purchases of shares at Aberdeen Petroleum are worthy of note. He purchased 500,000 shares at prices between 6p and 7p.

Is your PEP taxing you?

It's easy to lose sight of what should be your main priority in choosing a PEP. The potential for real long-term growth of your money.

That's what sets Foreign & Colonial apart. Since launohing the first investment trust in 1868, we've established a performance record that really stands out from the crowd.

$1,000 invested in Foreign & Colonial Investment Trust PLC on 31st December 1945 is today worth £635,802. The same sum invested ten years ago has now grown to $6,962. Over the years, we have outperformed insurance policies, Building Societies and also unit trusts, on which many PEPs are based. Foreign & Colonial has nine investment trusts to meet your objectives. Our portfolios offer a spread of global, European and UK shares, designed to provide capital growth and regular income.

Now we've launched a new investment trust specifically created for the PEP investor -Foreign & Colonial PEP Investment Trust.

What you could gain in performance won't be taken away in charges. You'll find rates that est PEP investments in the City. A flat rate $50+VAT initial fee for lump sums and just £5+VAT a month administration charges. You can also transfer your existing PEP to

Why TR City has proved popular with private investors and TR City of London has certainly delivered it. The annual dividend has been increased in each of the last 25 years and over ten years, its share price total return has been the fourth best of all investment trusts, with growth of 702.6 per cent.

This success has made the UK income trust very popular with private investors. The number of shareholders has quadrupled from 6.000 to nearly 24,000 over the last five years, and increased by more than 50 per cent in 1991-92 alone. TR estimates that institutional investors now own less than 20 per cent of the

But success can bring problems. The trust's shares are now standing at a 3 per cent premium to net assets, which means that private investors might be attracted to other trusts, such as Foreign & Colonial, which are standing at a discount. And the 25-year record of dividend increases may well be broken this year: the trust is forecasting a maintained payout.

Like many trusts, the name

ONSISTENCY is a much-prized virtue in investment trusts back to the company's 19th century origins. BT, BAT, Shell, BP, British Gas, BTR, Smithkline Beecham, Allied-Lyons, ICI and business was founded in 1860, and carried on brewing until 1932. Although the company became an investment trust at that date, City of London still owned pubs until 1970.

Then Touche Remnant took over the management and the company's name was changed

Grand Met.

The breakdown by sectors, as of June 30, was capital goods (16.4 per cent), consumer groups (33 per cent), oil & gas (9.4 per cent), financial groups (14.2 per cent) and others (27 per cent).

Around 75 per cent of the Private investors are often being urged to buy shares in investment trusts. But the names of many trusts are obscure, making it hard for the small investor to choose the right stock. In a new series Philip Coggan looks at TR City of London to TR City of London in 1982. The city tag does not mean that the group's investments are concentrated on the square The investment objectives are threefold: to have a higher yield than the FT-A All-Share Index, to get long term growth of capital and income in excess of the All-Share, and to invest predominantly in the shares of large companies assets are in FT-SE 100 constituents; a further 23 per cent is in the recently-formed FT-SE Mid-Cap index; and only 2 per cent in smaller

Although the trust has a portfolio yield around 20-25 per cent above the All-Share (which means it is currently about 5.4 per cent), it does not concentrate exclusively on the "high yield" area of the market. Income is boosted by a 5.5 per cent holding in convertibles and 1.5 per cent in

5 per cent is one of the main reasons why many investors pick the trust for their personal equity plans, since it offers some real tax benefits even after allowing for the charges.

The trust's long term performance also helps, although this has been boosted by the narrowing of the discount.

Over five years, growth has been 138.97 per cent, according to Micropal (mid-market to mid-market with income reinvested), placing TR City top of the UK income growth

In the short term, relative performance has dropped a bit with the trust, seventh out of ten in the sector over the year to January 1993. Could there be any reason for this? A change of manager is always a potential source of concern for investors and this might especially be the case with TR City, since Michael Moule (one of the doyens of the sector) stopped managing the trust in July 1991.

The new manager Job Curtis, aged 31, was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford (where he studied PPE)

Grieveson Grant as a graduate trainee in 1983. A short spell at Cornhill Insurance followed before he joined TR in 1987. He took over the management of the trust in July 1991, having been deputy for the previous three years.

However, Moule is still part the investment trust ent team at TR. And Lewis Aaron, senior investment trust analyst at S G Warburg Securities, is not concerned at the change.

"At most of the big houses, it is not just the individual fund manager's view, it's the house view on stocks" he says. "Job Curtis has been involved with the trust before and I see no reason at all for performance deteriorate" adds Aaron. Curtis says the trust's investment approach has three strands. The first is to be risk-averse and wary of companies with poor corporate governance. "The directors do have a small "black list" on which companies such as Maxwell appeared" says

The second strand is value investing - the aim of buying shares for less than their intrinsic worth. Curtis looks companies and offer some security, while many believe that the equity market should have a strong offered by companies which

underperformed so badly? The

trust says: "In 1988, companies wanted to issue new equity but

ments are in vogue,

undervalued assets such as land, mineral rights or brand

He also wants companies with high free cash flow, high return on assets and high research & development spending.

"Value eventually gets recognised" says Curtis "either by investors generally, by the management in running the company better or by a takeover". TR City claims a high "strike rate" in selecting takeover targets recently.

The third strand of the approach is income investing, given the need to maintain the higher than average yield. With 125 shares in the portfolio, the trust certainly has a broad spread of investments, although its larger company emphasis means one might expect some underperformance if the long-awaited "smaller long-awaited companies revival" actually occurs.

But Lewis Aaron of SG Warburg says "It's a good long term investment, not one for short term capital gains, but a good steady core holding. If, as a private investor, you wanted a UK trust, you would probably pick this one." ■ Key facts

The trust has gross assets of £260m and a market capitalisation of £243m, as of January 13. The dividend yield is 5 per cent. TR's annual ement charge is 0.39 per cent, based on a 3 year rolling average of assets. There is a modest amount of gearing, with £16m of debenture stock. Net asset value per share on January 13 was 123p, when the

UARANTEED products offer investors variations on the slogan "stock market growth or your money back". A new round has been launched this month. National & Provincial Building Society is offering a Guaranteed Equity Reserve account, which promises the rise in the FT-SE 100 Index in the form of "interest" which can be received at the end of a five

There is a slight twist on the normal formula, in that the final Footsie figure will be based on the average level of the index over the final six months of the product's life (September 1, 1997 to February 28, 1998). As a minimum, investors will receive their money back on maturity in March 1998.

Like most other products in this area, this account does not pay any income, nor does it reflect the income on the Footsie (which at 4-5 per cent a year is a significant component of equity returns).

Basic rate tax is deducted at source and the result is that such taxpayers will receive 100 per cent of the rise in the Footsle over the period (starting March 1). However, a bonus for those who invest before January 20, pushes the rate up to capital shares of split capital investment 103.7 per cent; those who invest between January 21 and February 15 will get 101.5

Higher rate taxpayers would face a further bill, bringing the return down to around 80 per cent of the Footsie's rise (or 83 per cent with the full bonus).

Unless they use up their £5,800 CGT allowance, higher rate payers would almost certainly do better to invest in a indexed fund, where the return would mostly come in the form of capital gain. However, unlike some insurance-based guaranteed products, N&P says that non-taxpayers can reclaim the tax on this account. This would convert the return into 133.33 per cent of the Footsie's rise (or 138.33 per cent with the full bonus). If you want to withdraw your money, you cannot do so during the first year. After that, there is a "penalty" of 5 per cent and no interest will be credited. The minimum investment is £1,000 and the maximum £250,000.

Hargreaves Lansdown, the financial adviser group, is offering a product which combines a fixed interest bond with the trusts. The fixed interest portion (in a guaranteed growth bond from Consolidated Life) will grow so that the total capital will rise by at least 20 per cent over five years (net of basic rate tax).

The capital shares then give the investor "geared" interest in the stock market. If the trust's assets rise by 7 per cent per annum, then the total return would rise to 40 per cent. Returns rise substantially as the investment assumptions get more optimistic.

There is an element of flexibility in the product since the investors can take profits on the capital shares if they rise substantially over the five year period. The minimum investment is £10,000.

Meanwhile, Sun Alliance is launching a third issue of its Capital Protector Bond. This offers a four year guarantee, but only 90 per cent of the fund is linked to stock market growth.

Charges are 4.5 per cent initial and 1.25 per cent annual; there are surrender penalties during the first four years. The minimum investment is £5.000

the late 1980s involved optimistic predators swallowing prey at the top of the market. Rather than issue conventional debt, they paid for their purchases in convertibles. This gave the predators immediate cost savings since yields on convertibles are lower than on automatically dampened convertible performance. In some cases, such as B &C, the companies crashed altogether. By 1990, the convertibles market was afflicted by both over-supply, and a disproportionate number of weak stocks. When the equity market recovered, therefore, convertibles failed to follow.

The other important factor pushing the convertible market is the "premium" which must be paid to convert into a normal share. Convertibles yield more than shares, so they will normally cost more. If their price rises, it is harder to gain an easy extra income by switching from ordinary and preference shares into convert-

This technical factor lies behind the other problem afflicting the market. According to Park: "People running high income funds found a year ago that they were in dividends, and that they could push up their yield by switching into convertible preference shares. In some companies that could be done almost on a like for like basis." The problem is that share prices in these companies have fallen while the convertibles have held firm. That means that fund managers now need to pay a premium to gain the extra yield from convertibles. As Park puts it: "To that extent I would say convertibles are not as attractive now as they were a year ago."

Not all fund managers agree with this. According to Val Rodway, of Allied Dunbar, there are several attractively priced convertibles on the market. The supply problem is that there are often no convertibles available in sectors which the equities research team recommends, she says. However, a pickup in market activity this year should lead to a recovery in new issues, she suggests. A final argument advanced for convertibles is their yield. Half the convertibles unit trusts are currently yielding in excess of 7.5 per cent, which is healthy. That yield could be an nervous about prospects for a genuine recovery. So is it worth investing in convertibles? The last five years show that they are not the no-lose bets which they might appear. But the sharpest effects of the late 1980s appear to have passed. The sector averaged an adequate total return after charges of 11.55 per cent in 1992 They should not be overlooked, particularly by those busy transferring money out of uncompetitive building society accounts. Some of this money could go into convertibles but not all. It is hard to justify more than a small weighting

Split trust launch

NEW split capital trust is being launched to tap the revived enthusiasm of private investors for the investment trust sector. Schroder Split Fund will offer a mix of zero coupon shares, income shares and capital shares. The zeros, as their name suggests, will pay no income but aim to give the investor steady capital growth. The zeros' launch price is 100p and the planned repayment value will be 203p in 2002, a gross redemption yield of 8.25 per cent a year. Profits will be taxed as capital gains, and will be effectively tax-free, since few investors use up their annual £5,800 CGT allowance. The zeros are 125 per cent covered at launch - in other words, the trust has more than enough assets at launch to repay the 2002 redemption value of the zeros in full.

The income shares will have a gross initial yield of 9 per cent, at the issue price of 100p. There is a significant risk of loss of capital; the trust's assets will have to grow at 4.2 per cent per annum for the shares to be repaid in full. However, the income shares can participate in the trust's growth. If the assets and income of Schroder Split rise by 7.5 per cent per annum, then the gross redemption yield will be 13 per cent.

Schroder is also offering a new High Income personal equity plan, based on the income shares. There will be no initial charge on the Pep between February 10 and March 4; the annual charge will be 1 per cent plus VAT. Income will be paid quarterly. The capital shares will be entitled to the remaining assets after the income and zero shareholders have been repaid. Shareholders will only be repaid their original investment of 25p if the assets grow by 4.7 per cent per annum between launch and 2002.

The "gearing" effect means capital shareholders will do well out of a bull market. If the trust's assets and income grow at 7.5 per cent per annum, the capital shareholders will receive a gross redemption yield of 21.5 per cent pa. One problem with some split capital trusts is that, to meet the income requirements, the manager has to invest in highyielding stocks or convertibles, at the expense of capital growth. The portfolio yield on Schroder Split will be 5.5 per cent which the manager argues is lower than on many other split trusts.

The launch expenses of the trust will be capped at 4 per cent and total annual expenses will be 0.7 per cent.

Money-back tax offer

ILLIONS on low incomes should pay heed to an Inland Revenue advertising campaign launched this week: it could give them up to £860 a year in refunds on taxes.

The Revenue is spending 12m on a campaign, aimed particularly at pensioners and married women who do not work, who may be entitled to back taxes.

Newspaper and television advertisements will form the backbone of efforts to catch the eye of the two-thirds of people who are eligible to claim but have not done so. About 8m will also receive a leaflet with their annual notice of coding.

Those affected include 2.5m married women who can claim back the tax credit on share dividends, and up to 15m people on low incomes who can register to receive bank and building society interest gross.

During the 1991-92 tax year. the Revenue estimated that only £150m of the £550m which could have been reclaimed was paid out, because only about 5m people contacted them for refunds.

The disappointing response came in spite of intensive advertising in the last two years. It contributed to the Revenue's decision in late 1992 to close a number of repayment offices and to reduce staff working in these divisions by up to 1,000.

The Revenue estimates that those who have not claimed under either scheme include 4m pensioners, 3m married women and 3m other adults and children. Substantial ignorance of who is eligible remains. A large number who claimed were not on sufficiently low incomes to qualify, while many who were did not bother.

A free telephone number (0800-660800) open from 10am-5pm on Monday to Friday has already begun operating and will run at least until the end of March.

MINDING YOUR OWN BUSINESS

Money for rope for man who makes ends meet

Keith Wheatley on Des Pawson who has turned his passion for knots into a business create business simply through the aroma of their catalogue? Des Pawson can. omer sits in his office high above Wall Street with the Footrope Knots brochure handy enough to sniff.

Instead of staples, the 16-page publica-tion is stitched with tarred marlin. This heavy twine used in traditional ropework is treated with Stockholm tar and has a smell evocative enough to bring the square-riggers back to life. Pawson believes he is the only business in the world tying knots, teaching knots, writing about knots and selling other enthusiasts the means to pursue their hobby.

wich emerges a steady stream of turks-heads, monkey fists, rope mats and all sorts of intricate ropework and netting. Equipment ranging from marin spikes to The History of Knot Theory (translated from the Danish) leaves by every post.

Pawson, a bearded cheery man with a matelot's patter, has also been used as an expert consultant by Surrey police pursuing a murder inquiry. Knots used to tie the victim yielded valuable clues to detectives.

"I've loved knots and been fascinated by them since I was a little boy," explained Pawson, 46. "But the difference between me and amateur tiers is that I've always had a financial interest

"When I was 11 I used to buy cord and turn them into fancy woggles for other Scouts and sell them at a profit. I've always believed my skill had a value."

Rather than running away to sea, after leaving school he spent five years working in Harrods furniture department. Pawson says it taught him all his basic skills of stock management, salesmanship and cash flow. He later put this background to use in running a film a year business for an East Anglian office supplies company.

All the while he was developing his hobby towards being a fully-fledged business which could support him and his wife Liz - two grown-up sons are at college. The first significant order was in 1968 for three dozen braided bell ropes for Captain O M Watts, the Mayfair chandler.

Like many crafts-people faced with volume orders, he began using outworkers for routine tasks. "I realised that with the promotional exercise than a retail one for

to do more than tie knots myself all day even if I had wanted to." Pawson said.

Ten years ago he was one of the founding members of the International Guild of Knot Tyers. From an initial 20 or so members it has grown to over 600, with subscribers in every large country. Faced with an audience of this size Pawson resolved to become the leading supplier of scarce materials for the enthusiast.

The large shed at the foot of his garden is a paradise for anyone who has ever loved the feel and smell of traditional rope. Coils of manilla, hemp and sisal fill the floor. Racks of shackles, fids and spikes line the benches. Pawson often has to track down materials from such arcane sources as French Navy surplus auctions.

"The problem is that I sometimes have to buy enough to last five years. The opportunity is that I'm the only person around who has got some of this stuff," he said, while illustrating the arcane merits of differently balanced marlin spikes.

Fellow knotters are encouraged to visit. Often they are "dropping by" en route to some serious business meeting but the lure of Pawson's wondrous shed proves too much for them.

His has two business tenets. He never borrows money and, from the earliest hobby days, he has made tax returns. Pawson says the first rule kept his feet on the ground and prevented things growing beyond their economic base, the second reminded him that it really was a business, however small. In the early days there was no tax to pay.

Nowadays, he says, Footrope Knots is turning over slightly more than £25,000 a year, with very low overheads. For the first time, Pawson will be running a knotting summer school at Suffolk College. He also writes Rope Yarns, a regular feature in The Bootman magazine.

Strong interest in the restoration of classic yachts has helped business. He is often called upon to recreate fenders and the like from sources such as Edwardian photographs. He feels the call of the sea himself and enjoys sailing a modest traditional Dutch scow.

Pawson has a stand at the London Boat Show which closes tomorrow and has been demonstrating his skills. "It's more of a scandal and privacy papers it is worth noting how relative these things are: one nation's political scandal is another nation's bore. In recent weeks Britain, France, and Germany have had to face frightful revelations about their politicians. Italy does not count since politicians there are expected to be frightful, and Italian newspapers could not cope with the various Lamont "scandals."

The fact that the British Chancellor of the Exchequer had inadvertently rented his house to a "sex therapist" was amusing enough, but the row over his acceptance of a Treasury offer of a mere 24,000, which did not go into his pocket anyway, was incomprehensible. The subsequent farcical developments, involving the publication of his credit card account and untrue stories relating to purchases of cheap champagne and cigarettes ensured that all foreign interest evaporated.

And so to the tedium of the influence-peddling scandals in Germany. The latest concerns the housing minister, Irmgard Schwaetzer, and a property company, Germania. In a contribution to its house magazine the minister seemed to be promoting the firm's interests. Earlier, the economics minister, Jürgen Möllemann, had to resign because he had tried to help out his wife's cousin over the matter of a patent on a supermarket trolley. Because of their sublime banality, these typically German affairs attracted little comment outside the country.

The only real horror story in this litany was the French blood contamination affair. This involved hundreds of haemophiliaes who were infected with the AIDS virus through state-run blood transfusions. French scandals have considerable bearing on the current debate in Britain on the role of the press, It is proposed, among other things, that there should be legal limits on invasions of hat a list of the names and addresses of the ings a last of the names and numerical from of Company's creditions may be impacted, from of charge, at New Garden House, 78 Hatton Garden, London EC1N SIA, between 10,000 a.m. and 4,000 p.m. on the two huminess days proceeding the date press and Le Monde took on the Socialist Party by helping to expose corruption there. French poodles even bite their friends.

Their record compares favourably with the British bulldogs. It was not heroic newspaper reporters who first shed light on the Guinness, BCCI, Maxwell and Matrix-Churchill affairs. In France a restrictive law on privacy, which allows "public interest" as a defence, combines with a system that makes libel cheap. This combination can help the press, if it is interested in important matters rather than trivia - partly because it discour-ages libel actions which perforce involve the plaintiff sacrificing the otherwise guaranteed right of privacy.

nder the French system means newspapers are fined if they reveal details of the colours of the football team in which the minister of culture is alleged to make love to his mistress. And they cannot publish pictures of even English duchesses disporting themselves with their financial advisers in a manner that falls short of the chaste standards that characterise the English aristocracy. What they can do is to say that Monsieur Farfelu is a crook and have a fair chance of getting away with it. In Britain the situation is exactly the reverse thanks to the extraordinary strictness of the libel laws which shield the guilty as well as the innocent and various bits of secrecy legislation.

That has helped to ensure that the British debate on press freedom has concen-trated on the Royal Family for that is the story that is at risk. In the great British theme park, the dream of happy royal marriages was fabricated by the media and the royal press office. So when, as is now the case, they turn out to be in the traditional mould there is a colossal row which can, some say, lead to the destruction of the House of Windsor. Had the press not connived at the new-fangled "family values" vision of royalty there would not be the trouble we are facing today. The real English tradition is that the monarch and his or her spouse regard each other with indifference or loathing. Queen Victoria notoriously broke with that tradition in her relations with Prince Albert. She was not popular until much later, after Prince Albert had died, which left the Queen 40 clear years to achieve a sacred reputation unencumbered by fantasies of domestic bliss. However, that does not now seem a likely prospect for the Prince of Wales.

Tell the taxman

ON September 30 last year, I retired at the age of 63%. At that time my tax affairs were completely in accordance with the PAYE tax tables.

The trustees of my employer's pension scheme purchased an annuity for me equal to the benefit to which I am entitled by that scheme and my P45 form forwarded by my ex-employers to the insurance company involved.

Instead of using this information the insurance company (on the instructions of the Inland Revenue, they claim) has been taxing me on an interim code (OT) which apparently authorises the removal on 25 per cent of the gross pension due, irrespective of my circumstances. This pension is my sole source of taxed income until I reach 65. As a result, although we are only nine months into the tax year, I have not only paid my complete tax liability for 1992/93. I have also had £274 deducted above my obligations (a credit towards my 1993/94 tax)

Have the Revenue the power to so over-tax me, and have I any claim for interest on the over-paid sum and the costs of postage, telephone, photocopying etc that I have incurred in getting the situa-

First the bad news: On the bare fact outlined, you do not appear to be eligible for any recompense from either the Revenue or the insurance company. Your complaint appears to lie against your employers: if they had explained what you should tell the insurance company's tax office in order to get the appropriate code applied to the pension, you would probably be paying the right amount of tax. For your employers simply to send your P45 to the insurance company was not very helpful - but there is, of course, no legal obligation upon employers to offer any guidance on tax matters to their retiring employees (and the cost of providing any such guidance could be taxable as a benefit). It is up to you to tell the tax office your date of birth. The fact that you have not given us enough information for us to calculate what your current code number should be, suggests that you may not have given enough information to the tax office either. So, probably, the tax office is not be blame, but neither are you, because you did not know what you should have told them. Write to the insurance company's tax office, giving formal notice of objection to code OT under regulation 10(1) of the Income Tax (Employments) Regulations 1973, as amended; if possible say what you think the code number ought to be. Tell them your date of birth, the total pay and tax shown on your P45 (if known), and the amount of untaxed income which you expect to receive in 1992-93. (You told us that the pension is your "sole source of taxed income" at present, but you said nothing about your untaxed income).

If you do not receive a satisfactory response within a couple of weeks, write to the District Inspector saying that, in default of agreement to your objection, you now give formal notice of appeal against the determination of code OT and that you require the appeal to be heard by the General Commissioners in February without fail, in order that the correct (retrospective) coding be applied to the final instalment of your pension for the current tax year. We take it that you would have no difficulty in attending a meeting of the General Commissioners at short notice, in order to present your argument for an appropriate code number.

Losses on warrants

I HAVE held 6,000 Eurotunnel warrants since 1988. I did not exercise the warrants because the cost of doing so was greater than the value of the Eurotunnel shares they would have yielded. Last November the warrants lapsed. Can I set the loss of the adjusted cost of the warrants against investment gains for Capital Gains Tax purposes? ■ Yes, by virtue of section 144(4 & 8) of the Taxation of Chargeable Gains Act 1992:

"(4) The abandonment of ... a traded option . . shall constitute the disposal of an asset (namely of the option) ...

"(8) In subsection above . . . "traded option" means an option which, at the time of the abandonment.. is quoted on a recognised stock exchange . . .

If your tax inspector should try to restrict your allowable loss by invoking the notorious wasting-asset rules (which apply to some types of option), refer him or her to section 146 of the Act. This says the wasting-asset rules "shall not apply ... to a traded option ... ", as defined in section 144(8).

Nuances of CGT on trusts

YOU recently explained the CGT treatment of unit and investment trust savings schemes. Is not the situation even more complicated?

According to the leaflet sent with my unit trust annual report, for CGT purposes the total amount of income reinvested, as shown on the tax credit vouchers, should be added to the original cost. For indexation, when is the dividend received?

Presumably it is added to the value of the units as it is received from the constituent companies, and the voucher is only a summary of the amounts received in the year. Yes, the calculations for accumulation units are generally more complicated than those for monthly savings schemes, or automatic reinvestment schemes. For accumulation units purchased after the end of March 1985, the net retained income shown on the first voucher ranks for indexation from the day on which the units were purchased; subsequent net retentions rank for indexation from either the latest date provided by the trust deed (for any distribution in respect of the distribution period in question), or, if no date is so provided, the last day of the distribution period. This complex rule is derived from sections 99 and 113 of the Taxation of Chargeable Gains Act 1992, in conjunction with section 468 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988. The rules are slightly different for units purchased between the end of 1981-82 and the beginning of April 1985; they are significantly different for units purchased before April 6 1982. The position would also be slightly different if more than one retention date fell within the first year after the purchase, or if none did.

Lunch for a fiver — ready for take-off

N INKLING that "Lunch for a Fiver" was going to be a suc-cess occurred when my phone rang at 9.30am on Monday. It was the man who handles public relations for one of the best-known Park Lane hotels. "Was it too late," he wondered, "for the hotel to be included in the

This year we had to disappoint, but such has been the response and interest that any future schemes which we plan will try to satisfy more restaurateurs and hoteliers and even more customers.

This week's list of restaurants includes several small amendments to that which appeared last Saturday. Firstly, the FT's computer list omitted one restaurant entirely, 192 of 192 Kensington Park Road, London W11 2JF (071-229-0482), which is not open for lunch on Mondays. The omission was particularly ironic since a letter from 192's managing director, Tony Mackintosh, had been one of the first enthusiastic responses.

It read: "Of course we are in for your scheme. Great idea. Hope it is a huge

Then the owners of Daphne's in Draycott Avenue, London SW3, phoned to say that builders who were working there would still be on the premises on January 18 and that, therefore, it would have to withdraw. So if you live in that area try instead Walton's or Turner's, both just around the corner in Walton Street.

To keep the same number of participating restaurants, I am pleased to add Le Cafe des Amis du Vin, 11-14 Hanover Place, Covent Garden, London WC2, (tel 071-379-3444). One change of nationality over the New Year: the Machino Japanese Restaurant has become the Young Bin Kwan Korean restaurant.

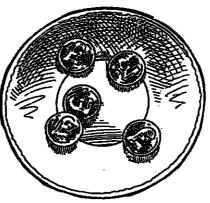

One Chelsea restaurateur, Tom Benham of Monkeys, SW3, reported that although bookings were excellent, some of his callers were asking whether bread rolls were included in the £5 and what was the price of his mineral water.

Fortunately, this seems to be an isolated case of mean-mindedness. Overall, readers have responded with warm enthusiasm to the restaurant trade's answer to the January sales.

Brian Clivaz, general manager of Simpson's in-the-Strand, reported that within three days he had received 365 bookings and that some of those booking

One restaurant in the City started its £5 lunch four days early to meet demand while Adlard's, in Norwich, Norfolk, was booked out for the entire two weeks by Thursday last week. California's double whammy

Jancis Robinson on viruses which poses a new threat to US west coast vines

Y this time of year, nurseryman Rich Kunde of Sonoma Grapevines would usually have grafted more than half a million vines for sale to California's grape growers. This year, he has not grafted a single one.

This is despite the fact that demand for young vine cuttings in California has never been greater. Because of the predations of a new strain of phylloxera, the plant louse which devastated the vineyards of Europe and beyond a century ago, Californians are engaged in a big vineyard replanting programme. The only known deterrent to the insect is to graft vines on to phylloxera-resistant rootstocks. The AxR-1 rootstocks, on which the California wine industry is dependent, have been productive but not resistant enough.

Some forecasts say the majority of vineyards in Napa and Sonoma, California's most famous wine regions, will have to be completely replanted over the next decade. But Kunde knows something so serious that, as he puts it, it could be "a tidal wave that will make the phylloxera thing look like a little ripple".

For decades, Davis, the University of California wine research centre, has prided itself as the world's prime source of virus-free vine cuttings from its solidsounding Foundation Plant Materials Service. Virus diseases have throughout history wreaked almost as much damage as phylloxera on the world's vineyards. Fanleaf is bad but the worst is leafroll virus, probably caused by a group of viruses, which can halve yields but also slows ripening so that the resultant wines are thin Leafroll's chief symptom is visible only on some varieties and only during the vines may turn over on themselves and take on deceptively beautiful autumnal colours. It is particularly difficult to detect because on some varieties, and all root-stocks (essential for California's phylloxera-resistant replanting programme), there are no visible symptoms at all.

For years, it has been taught, and believed, that leafroll can be spread only by using cuttings from infected plants. But last summer, the FPMS at Davis began testing the all-important 'mother vines' for leafroll, using the sophisticated ELISA technique developed in the early 1980s. This was to ensure that the millions of cuttings released to vine growers all over the world each year really are virus-free. The plant pathologist found to his horror that about 20 per cent of some batches tested positive, even though they had been selected from apparently virus-free plants.

The situation progressed from sleepless nights to shared knowledge to task forces to decisions and, on December 16, the FPMS issued a letter explaining why they had stopped issuing plant material, admitting that the virus seems to be spreading through their supposedly virus-free Foundation Vineyard and they have not a clue

This rather elliptical communication, however, may still be languishing at the bottom of various holiday in-trays. The real showdown will take place this Tuesday at a meeting with California nurserymen and grape growers.

They are confused enough already by what they call the latent virus phenomenon, whereby cuttings taken from vines that performed superbly when grafted on to AxR-1 rootstocks, show horrible virus symptoms now that they are being grafted on to phylloxera-resistant rootstocks. Not to mention the nasty Pierce's disease for which there is no known cure and which is a particular problem in southern California and in some Napa vineyards. Not that leafroll spread has come out of the blue. Some observers had noticed leafroll in the Davis vineyards some time ago, but it was not taken seriously. Leafroll

Ancient California vines: prey to a virus

WORTHWHILE CALIFORNIAN SELECTIONS

■ WHATEVER happens, California's best wines, which (unlike most from the New World) have real distinction and subtlety are unlikely to get any cheaper. Morris & Verdin of London SW1 (tel: 071-830-8888) import one of the UK's most interesting selections, including Au Bon Climat and Bonny Doon's deliberately quirky range. Bibendum of London NW1 (071-722 5577) and of York (0423-330131) also try harde than most, with Chalk Hill, Saintsbury, and Kistler's divine 1990 McCrea Chardon actually worth the premier cru price, £17.50, asked for it. The Wine Treasury of London SW1 (071-730-6774) also imports Kistler and Williams-Selyem's famous Pinot Notr. Bonny Doon, Mt Eden, Rochioli Pinot Noir and Joseph Swan Zinfandel are available from Raeburn Fine Wines of Edinburch (031-332-5166). Ridge, Chalone, Edna Valley and Mondavi are available from Les Amis du Vin, London W1 (071-487-3419) while John Armit Wines of London W11 (071-727-6846) has Ravenswood Zinfandel Meanwhile, Oddbins are committed to nosino out California bargains.

had also appeared in New Zealand's National Foundation Vineyard, made up of cuttings imported from Davis, some years back. But again, it was ignored because everyone believed leafroll could only be spread from infected vines and these were vines guaranteed by Davis to be virus-free. In Taiwan, another FPMS client had noticed strange patterns of virus spread too, as had some growers in Europe and South Africa, it now emerges. Although no one knows how the virus is spreading, and a definitive answer within less than a few years seems unlikely, a vector, an insect perhaps, is implicated.

Leafroll is not only difficult to spot, it is impossible to cure. Californians who have just replanted a vineyard after the predations of phylloxera now cannot be sure that they have not, in fact, planted virused vines and/or virused rootstocks which will have to pulled up again when, after a further three years or so, they can monitor the vines' performance.

International viticultural consultant Dr Richard Smart has already advised clients in Australia as well as California to pull out any vines showing signs of leafroll, especially if mealy bug is present unwelcome advice when vines are expected to produce for up to 30 years but take three years to establish in the vineyard.

What a blow to an industry that so recently looked so rosy. For the moment, growers may be paralysed and nursery man such as Kunde can do little other than hope that it was ELISA at fault all along. Instead of grafting new cuttings for sale, he is currently instituting painstaking tracking systems whereby every cutting he has sold can be traced right back to its source.

Napa's most viticulturally aware wine producers, said: "There is now a great deal of uncertainty about how rapidly we can go forward with this replanting programme. We may move out of the phylloxera frying pan into the fire of these viruses, Pierce's disease and so on."

Cookery/Philippa Davenport

For financiers who are serious about eating...

NCE IN a while, it is a challenge to cook a seriously luxurious recipe, if only to keep one's hand in. Hence Riz à la Financière, my simplified version of a classic. The original is a very grand dish of sweetbreads blanched then larded with strips of bacon and studded with pieces of truffle, tongue and ham - a little slice of a lot of good things. The prepared sweet-breads are then braised, garnished with quenelles of veal fillet or chicken, cockscombs, kidneys, mushrooms and truffles, cloaked in a Madeira sauce with truffles and cream, and served in a puff pastry vol-au-vent. Phew.

However, the classic dish is not really fit for modern consumption, even by financiers. Veal sweetbreads are scarce and cost nearly £10 per ib, so I have changed the principal ingredient from sweetbreads to rice, an economical move from ris to riz. I have also excluded cockscombs - even Harrods does not stock them. The humble lamb's tongue, the texture of which is said to be similar, can be used instead.

Fillet of pork can replace fillet of veal. and lamb kidneys can stand in for calves' kidneys. As for fungi, truffles, porcini or ordinary cultivated mushrooms can be used, or a mixture of all three. Not all these ingredients are necessary, but beware too many exclusions or you will end up with only a bowl of rice.

The rice could be all white, virginal pure, or wild rice with shavings of truffle. as black as sin, depending on how far into the red you are prepared to take your bank balance. And the sauce must be rich.
RIZ A LA FINANCIERE OR BANKER'S RICE

The ingredients and workload which follow look daunting but the good news is that all the cooking can be done ahead.

Rather to my surprise, I found that even the meats reheat well - providing they are reheated gently in some of the sauce in a tightly covered dish in a hot water bath in a moderate oven.

At least 2lb of meats are needed, ideally 10 oz of each of four different sorts, as listed below. If one type of meat is unobtainable, use just three varieties, increasing the weight accordingly, or replace the missing item with chicken livers.

For the meats and fungi; 8-10 oz veal or lamb sweetbreads; 8-10 oz lamb's tongues; 8-10 oz veal fillet (or pork fillet or chicken breast); 8-10 oz veal or lamb kidneys; ½ oz dried porcini (optional); 8oz cap mushrooms, preferably so-called chestnut mushrooms; unsalted or clarified butter for frying; shavings of truffle or sprigs of watercress to garnish.

For the souce: 12 fl oz Madeira; 2 shallots, finely chopped; a nut of butter; 23 sprigs of thyme; % pt good veal or chicken stock (or % pt veal or chicken stock plus % pt of the liquid saved from soaking dried porcini); the finely chopped stalks of the fresh mushrooms; 1-2 tablespoons chopped celery leaves; beurre manie made by mashing together 11/2 tablespoons each softened butter and plain flour; ½-1 teaspoon La Truffata (a blend of truffle and porcini purée available from delicatessens, Waitrose and selected branches of Sainsbury); a little lemon juice; 4-6 tablespoons double

For the rice: 12 oz long grain white rice plus 4 oz wild rice (or whatever ratio of wild to white your bank balance sug-gests); minced black truffle or a splash of truffle juice (optional); 1-2 tablespoons lightly toasted sesame seeds; butter.

First prepare the meats. Soak the sweetbreads in cold salt water for a couple of hours. Cover with fresh salt water, bring to the boil and simmer for two minutes. Plunge in cold water for five minutes then peel away membrane and connective tissue so the sweetbreads can be separated into smaller sections.

Soak the tongue for one hour in cold water with a squeeze of lemon juice. Bring to the boil in fresh cold salt water or stock and simmer gently for 50 minutes or until tender. Plunge in cold water, remove skin, gristle and excess fat from the base of the tongue. When cold, slice thinly. Cut the veal fillet (or pork fillet or chicken breast meat) into quills. Core the kidneys and cut into bite size pieces. (Lamb kidneys are best soaked in milk for an hour before coring and slicing - save the milk for an appreciative cat.) If using chicken livers, clean them and cut into lobes. Put each sort of meat as soon as prepared into a separate bowl, cover and

about 7 fl oz warm water. When softened and swollen, drain them and reserve. Strain their flavoursome liquid carefully and save it for making the sauce. Trim the stalks from the fresh mushrooms, chop finely and save for the sauce.

To make the sauce, first put the Madeira into a pan with the butter, shallots and thyme, and boil down to about 5 tablespoons. Add the mushroom stalks, celery leaves, some pepper and the stock. Cover and simmer for 20 minutes or so. Then strain, pressing the solids to extract every drop of their flavour.

Reheat and thicken the sauce lightly by stirring in gradually small nuggets of the beurre manie. Blend in the Truffata purée mixed with the cream and season with lemon, salt and pepper to taste.

For the rice, first cook the white and wild rices in fast boiling salted water until just cooked. Give the wild rice 15-20 minutes head start as it takes longer than white rice to become tender. Drain, add knobs of butter, season well and stir in the minced truffle or truffle juice if using it. Spread the rice out to cool it.

Then spoon it into a large ring mould tin that has been thickly buttered and lined with a sprinkling of sesame seeds. Pack the rice well down into the tin, pressing it firmly with the back of the spoon. The more neatly it follows the curve of the tin, the easier it will be to unmould.

Cover the rice with a foil lid and reheat in the oven when required, allowing 20 minutes at 400 F (200 C) gas mark 6. (Or if reheating the meats as well, use a lower oven temperature and bake for longer, placing both the rice mould and the dish of meats in a hot water bath to protect against drying out.)

When ready to cook the meats, first saute the fresh mushrooms in a little very hot butter, remove and keep hot. Add more butter to the pan and saute the meats; first the veal fillet, next the kid-neys, then the chicken livers if using them. Finally, add the sweetbreads, tongue and porcini and cook for a few minutes more, stirring and turning the ingredients frequently.

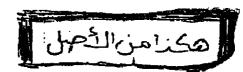

water. Stir the meaty syrup into the Madeira sauce and add any juices from the mushrooms. Then spoon enough sauce over the meat mixture to coat it lightly.

To serve, unmould the rice onto a large flat dish, pile the meats into the centre of the barricade and arrange the mushrooms in a ring round the edge. Grate fresh truffle over them if your budget permits. Bring to the table with sauceboats of hot

In 1991, the suggestion of writing about fur was greeted at a Tatler editorial conference with gasps: "Real fur?" and a firm reproach that "our readers don't like fur and they don't wear it". But in September last year that editorial policy was reversed. By December, even Vogue and The Daily Telegraph had caught up with the latest consensus. If all this seems like some inexplicable conspiracy theory, then the question to ask is Cui bono? The answer is, of course, the women's magazines and fashion pundits themselves. Their gripe against fur is more than skin-deep.

Their attack on fur is a test of their ability to manipulate trends; for fashion is only a powerful weapon so long as it can be defined as more the possession of intangible knowledge than of tangible things.

So it was that we have had the trend for all things fake fake pearls, less than genuine bosoms, and, of course, synthetic furs. The object? To devalue, if not to expropriate, what is real.

t is not the rich who lose out. Those who can afford it can wear what they want, and if they no longer want fur they can indulge some other whim without the least hardship. For the rich, anyway, fashion is an amusement, and the more drastically it changes the more amusing it is. The poor are also immune unless they happen to work

The ones who lose out are somewhere in between. For such people, fur is a well-considered investment: rather like a Savile Row suit. It transcends fashion and it is a symbol of independence. And it is this which the arbiters of style cannot abide Yet this year we are told that fur is back in fashion. Fur trims and accessories are in the collections, and it is all right to wear fur as a transient, authorised adornment. The debate has

Gösing is not the easiest of places to get to. It sits in the isolated Otscherland, in a part of Lower Austria where the Alps break up into steep, thickly-wooded hills before tailing off into the broad plains of eastern Europe.

Foresters, loggers and smallscale hill farmers live in its valleys. Its upper reaches have a different population - they are much favoured by mountain chamois, moufflon, roebuck, red stag, and the men who hunt them.

To get there I had left the comforts of the Danube and driven high into the hills through the towns of Ybbs, Scheibbs and Puchenstuben. The wilder the names became, the wilder the country too. Up I snaked through steep-sided valleys, towards a blanket of autumn mist. By the time I pulled up outside the Gösing Alpenkurhotel in the late afternoon, the mist was curling through pine forests below me; I felt as if I had arrived at the end of the Earth.

Could this be the right hotel? Surely not, I thought. I was in the Otscherland because I was interested in Austrian staghunting, much reputed among that shrinking band of enthusiasts still enthralled by guns and big game. But where were the hunters?

There were elderly gentle-men wrapped in fluffy white towels shuffling in and out of sauna-rooms. There were stainless steel dispensers marked

I may have felt guilty, but not guilty enough to avoid the game pate and venison with cranberry sauce offered on the hotel game menu that evening. Surrounded by hunters now busy quaffing beer, downing rich red meat and swapping hunting stories, I discussed my own stag-hunting plans with Octavian Gassaver, the hotel's owner and an avid hunter.

Is hunting barbaric, a slaughter of defenseless animals by inadequate individuals? Or, more nobly, is it part of the larger cycle of life and death in the natural world, an age-old survival instinct buried deep in man's culture? These were not questions Herr Gassaver asked me directly. He merely wanted to know whether I preferred to come along as an observer or wanted to carry a rifle and hunt. Simple questions invite more difficult ones, though, and I found myself hesitating, for I have never been able to come down firmly on one side or the other of that most emotive of issues, the morality of blood sports, I am both attracted and repelled by them, and that is why they interest me. Stalking and killing a large wild animal is both exciting and senseless. Is there such a thing as civilised hunting, or is that a contradiction of terms?

My first inclination was to believe that it was all rather nasty. Take stag-hunting. When my host told me I would have a good chance of shooting stag, and this is not easy", he told me in his rough and ready English. "The best way is to hear it cry. And when does it cry? When it is in love."

Herr Gassaver, I finally realised, was referring to the rutting season. Autumn is the time of year when stags lose their caution, come into the open and try to attract females with loud and desperate-sounding mating calls.

My moral problem eased itself the moment I asked how much the fees would be. They vary, I found out, according to a complex formula of length, weight, size and shape applied not to the stag itself - the animal is not the final object of the hunt - but to its horns.

What about the stag in the back of the truck, I asked. I tried to picture horns like that hanging on my dining room wall. About 180 points, Herr Gassaver suggested. That would cost something over £5,000 in trophy fees, which did not include 20 per cent VAT. In hunting as in most theatres of life, economics usually push moral considerations out of the Off we bounced through the picture. I retired to bed with my conscience clear; I would forest on dirt roads, down the just watch the early morning

I was woken at 3.30am and 30 minutes later was sitting in the back of a Toyota beside Asta, a prized red Bavarian bloodhound. In the front were Christian Kupfer - her master and the Alpenkur's head-hunting guide - and Didier Hugot, his mountainside, along a narrow valley, then high up the opposite ridge. The weather was abysmal. As we drove through the dark our headlights cut through a steady fall of rain. Nevertheless, Didier Hugot, an extroverted company executive from Paris, was up-beat. Hunting, he told me, was no fun if it

The next few hours were not easy, but neither were they a lot of fun. We stopped the truck in a clearing and stepped out into cold rain. In the pitch black I could barely make out my companions beside me, much less the steep and heavily-wooded hillside.

Christian allowed us not a single word, nor the smallest sliver of light. How he and Hugot climbed blind through a forest without making any noise mystified me. My own small achievement lay in smothering foul oaths - within five minutes I had banged into a tree, smacked my ankle against a rock, and nose-dived into a small and muddy stream. By the time we arrived, half-an-hour later, at a small hunting blind, I had begun to feel that the antihunting brigade was right: this was a cruel sport.

And there we sat, waiting. The rain fell and the light lifted. Occasionally raising binoculars to their eyes, the two hunters kept their eyes roving over the dim grey space ahead. Asta dozed. My bottom was numb, my foot went to sleep. I dripped. Nobody spoke, nothing happened; 6 am came and went. There were no disconsolate mating calls, no love-lorn stags. Finally Christian had to admit defeat – rain was keeping the stags in the shelter of the forest. We trudged away.

I felt disappointed. Didier

Hugot, on the other hand, did not. There is much more to hunting, he told me, than the kill. He estimated that for every stag he has shot he has put in 30 hours of hill clim-bing, stalking, or just waiting. I asked him why he came such a long way to spend so much money for such hard-earned results. Was there no hunting in France?

Of course there was, he replied "But hunting here has nothing to do with hunting at home. In France, especially the South, we blast anything that moves. It is complete anarchy." In Austria it was different. Hugot said. Here, as in Germany and Switzerland, there was a discipline, a strong and much-cherished hunting tradition. Teutonic hunting culture dated from the Middle Ages when the hunting of "high game" like deer, roebuck and

game" such as hare and fowl) was the privilege of the wealthy land-owning class. Austrian society may be more democratic today, but noble hunting traditions persist. Every hunter subjects himself to a strict code of behaviour. He takes years to build the knowledge he needs to pass an Austrian hunting

Look how hunters in Austria dress", Hugot said, indicating his own cape and clothes. "In everything they do there is a style and an attitude that gives value to hunting. This is what counts. I did not kill a stag today. What does it mat-ter? It is the ambience, the ethic that is important. The final act, pulling the trigger, is almost irrelevant."

> 'There is much more to hunting than the kill'

Didier Hugot had not displayed a blood-thirsty, smoking-barrel-and-spent-shot machismo. He had not come remotely close to shooting a stag. But he had thoroughly enjoyed himself. Even I, crashing about on the hillside and with no qualifications to wear tyrolean green, had enjoyed myself. Austrian hunting is an expensive, esoteric art in which the means seem to count as much as the ends.

I did see one more stag before leaving Gösing, or at least part of one. I watched Christian Kupfer outside his forest chalet boiling a stag's head in a metal drum to remove its flesh before sawing away its frontal bone and horns. It was not a terribly pretty sight. Sometimes hunting is a cruel and barbaric practice. But I am more tempted now to believe it can also be a civilised sport.

Truth of the Matter

ILTON'S Areopagitica is one of those classics of English prose more often quoted than read.

"As good almost kill a man as kill a good book." It is packed with such proverbs and pieties of independent authorship easily quoted whenever the question of censorship arises. Yet its quotability does it disservice. It ought to have furnished principles of guidance to Sir David Calcutt: but presumably he, like the rest of us, supposed Milton to be defending the freedom of authors, not journalists; since not even their most brazen supporters would claim that any conduit of the gutter press carried "the precious life-blood of a master spirit". Re-reading the Areopagitica, I

England hath need of thee, says Nigel Spivey, who especially commends him to David Calcutt find that it survives remarkably well not only as the classic case for works of art to find free expression, but also a valid argument against most of the measures proposed for curbing the British press.

It was written in 1644, as an explicit protest against an Order of Parliament intended to confine all printed matter to government-licensed presses. Many scandalous, seditions and libellous" works had been noted by Members of Parliament, "to the great defamation of religion and government".

The legislation granted powers to the Stationers' Company to search for unlicensed presses and destroy them. Milton's reply to this was cunning in its rhetoric:

he permeated his polemic with anti-Papal sentiments, likening the government licensing system to the protocol of stamping a book with an Imprimatur - "let it be published" - and treating a grave subject with less than Miltonic gravity. He made it appear as if the legislation were so absurd that it caused even him, a committed

Behind the rhetoric, however, is a core of good sense which deserves rehearsal. The Areopagitica does not indulge the classic dilemma of liberalism. That is, it accepts the natural company of both good and evil. It does not propose a template of censorship where printed matter may be judged either proper or improper. Regulation is not a relative measure here. Government either controls the press, or it does not. If it chooses to control, then it must be consistent. Milton reminds us of Plato's system of enlightened guardians, who were thorough in their regulation. They licensed not only people's reading matter, but people's clothes, people's music, and even people's sex lives.

"Who shall regulate all the mixed conversation of our youth?" he translates into totalitarianism: that is why newspaper editors have universally tagged the Calcutt Milton is not an anarchist. He believes in standards. And he admits that unlicensed printing results in the circulation of trash. But unlike Sir David Calcutt, he is not prepared to countenance legislation against trash: "I cannot praise a fugitive and cloistered

From that, one may reasonably suppose that were Milton called to testify today, he would prefer to see his monarchs plagued by paparazzi than place themselves, in carefully chosen poses, before carefully chosen image-makers. Agreed, that preference allows oddiness, mud-slinging and "inaccuracies" - all the impurities to which Sir David Calcutt addressed himself - but it also allows for truth to prevail over half-truth, for gold to outweigh dross, and the preservation of persuasion. The false and the badly-researched will reveal themselves, so long as the powers of selection remain with the reading public, not the nabobs of some statutory council. The Miltonic attitude may seem optimistic. But it was the same conclusion reached by the Williams Report on Obscenity and Film Censorship in 1979, and Milton would be heartened by the most recent figures from the Audit Bureau of Circulations, which detail newspaper sales for June until November last year.

Taking into account the influence of the recession, there are clear signs of tabloid decline. Not even an annus horribilis can sustain publications dependent upon perpetual melodrama, it seems. But most heartening to followers of Milton is the 18 per cent fall in sales of the Sunday Sport. The initial success of this paper was immensely depressing to anyone with the slightest moral intelligence: its six-month decline from 366,091 readers from June 1 to 299,477 readers in November shows an appreciable upsurge in discrimination from types one might otherwise have defined as cretins. Acceptable levels of trash. That is what Milton argued for, not only as a price worth paying for the preservation of the free spirit of enquiry, but also as a sort of moral background noise. In his words: "That which purifies us is trial." We recognise quality because we know what is bad; and we do not need Sir David Calcutt, or anyone

Many books exist, but nobody has ever written the ideal book on how to design a garden: what is the reason and what can be said meanwhile? One reason is the variety of

HILE THESE although we have all been inspired by them. They fix a particular light or a particular moment; they cast a glamorous focus on one good feature.

Editors tend to print only those photographs which look seductive. Design is also a difficult subject to describe. Books can be grand and lofty or woolly and vague. The late Russell Page was a remarkable example of the former style, rivalled by Sylvia Crowe in the Matters were not much better in the great age of Capability Brown and his successors. I find that their historic writings suffer the same problems. Without writing a book, I will try to avoid extremes and offer a few guiding thoughts.

Before me stretches a newlycleared border, blank like the human mind, in the 17th century's imagery of one. How do I start thinking about it? I always try to picture the final result in context. Will the design fit in? Will it suit that phrase from the 18th century, "the genius of the place", and look good in its surroundings? This habit of thought discourages pure borrowing. The wrong way to begin is with something "as seen at Sissinghurst" or in a photo of Tintinhull, to be copied exactly in east Essex. Unlike foxgloves, other people's bright ideas do not transplant anywhere. Straight plagiarism looks scrappy and unconvincing, although photographs sometimes encourage it. I will limit myself to some clear thoughts about borders. In a border, I would always go mixed. Herbaceous borders and beds of nothing but roses are too limited in form, season and texture: why not have some pale blue ceanothus among musk roses or mock orange blossom in a bed of civilised

Shrubs give backbone, especially if they are evergreens, repeated at wide intervals. My favourite hardy evergreen for this purpose is the white-flowered osmarea burkwoodii, as nurseries describe it. In mild districts, I would also use waxy green pittosporum. Several groups of each divide a bigger border into sections which are much easier to visualise. Even in a small garden, start with thoughts of backbone and then span the boundaries by reading and plundering several chapters of sections in a catalogue. You might even like to grow scarlet runner beans on tall stakes for height in the back

Books and plans still encourage you to plant in blocks at a density of five plants or more to a square yard. The density is impossibly expensive and I would always prefer to buy one big plant for nearer £3 and split it myself into pieces, growing them on carefully during their first year. I am also against blocks.
The shrewd Miss Jekyll pre-drifts which are longer than broad. She felt, quite rightly, that drifts were less obtrusive when out of season. This preference is evident in most of her border plans, printed in her books or visible in facsimile in a garden shed at Hestercombe, near Taunton in Somerset. I also like to scatter and repeat.

After the backbone, my thoughts always begin with a plant which I want to be the main feature down a border or round a garden in any one fortnight. I then repeat individual bits of it often enough to lead the eye in search of it. Designers and their books underestimate this trick. Their schemes ferred the thinner shape of are cluttered up with subtle theories of colour and heights. oranges and purples are Meanwhile, the eye will jump over a mass of stems out of season and head for someallow harmony or contrast. thing which is directly in season. You can test this principle on any garden-watchers who come to visit. They like to be able to say that the sweet rocket is looking wonderful in early June or that the single pink rose complicata is amazing in July. The eye mi drawn to something and then led on by repetition so that it overlooks weaknesses and retains one instant impression. What about colour? My rule here is discrimination, but not floral apartheid. I do not go for single coloured borders, all white or all purple. In very large gardens, they can still be an amusing enclosure, but oth-erwise they limit choice. Blues, yellows, pale pinks and whites form one group in my mind's eye; all or some of them will combine very happily, provided that the yellows are not

turn to silver-leaved plants to help you out of the problem. They combine with almost anything and take the edge off a hard colour. As a general rule, strong colour is better near the back of a wide bed. In eye and diminishes depth. Like all rules, this one is all the better for being broken occasionally, But if you break it too often and put all the ghostly colours at the back, you will foreshorten the border's scale. What, lastly, are the overriding values? For me, they are scent, season and amiable elements of scattiness. If you are looking for scent, use a specialised book, of which Scent in Your Garden by Stephen Lacey is a helpful guide. Always use plants which have a longer season than a week or so: as yet, there is no fully reliable guide

ery catalogues which imply that their plants will flower for many more months than most of them do. Whenever I descend to detail, it is this value of season which preoccupies me. You can have three or more different borders if you cultivate a sense of season and think of the space as a stage on which different acts in succession will take the limelight.

in the UK, least of all the nurs-

As for scattiness, you already have the drift of it. Be formal, but not too formal when planting and distributing flowers. You should cultivate an artful air of wilderness and aim for that moment when gardens look as if they are just about to run out of control. You see why good design is the subject with so few classics: I know this quality when I see it, but I cannot quite describe it specifically. Perhaps it is like theology. The Unauthorised Border: there, perhaps, is the title which might have the properly scatty scope.

This is fly fishing, which is, and has long been, an international sport. But the majority of the army of anglers across Europe seek their pleasure in species other than trout and salmon. Their joy is in pike, carp, perch and the like. And here there is a guif between the British and their continental counterparts which it will take more than treaties, summits and avalanches of regula-cal aversion to killing fish has developed. A man found knocking a carp or tench on expulsion from his club. With this invincible prefudice comes the assumption of moral superiority. The average British fisherman knows little of how they do things abroad. But he knows that the continental angler beats everything he catches to death, and then cooks it with strange and unnatural ingredients. He thus fishmonger, sunk in primitive beastliness, indifferent to the suffering of his prey and to the welfare of the environment. The view from abroad is equally unflattering. To the continental, the link between quarry and table is central to the sport. He is a hunter, a provider of food. The idea of sitting for hours, enduring every kind of discomfort, only to return the catch to the element from which it has been removed at such cost is laughable. It is another species of English madness. I like to think I can see the strengths and weaknesses in both philosophies. It seems to me wasteful and wanton to kill every fish you catch, whether anyone wants to eat it or not, and it is a depredation which waters cannot stand for long. But I hate the English intolerance and ignorance.

The old books are full of quaint recipes for freshwater fish. But we have lost the habit. Within the UK coarse fishing fraternity, a puritani-

I will be doing my bit for culinary and piscatorial bridge-building this year. But the lead must come from the top. One day, perhaps, the prime minister will tuck into carpe a l'ancienne at the Elysée; and offer the French president at the return banquet stewed eel or barbel stuffed with sweetbreads, crayfish and artichokes. Then we will know the barriers are coming down.

Some regard them as vulgar ostentation, but Gwyn Headley believes them to be the manifestations of architectural individuality that made this country the cynosure of the world".

Headley is so convinced of the appeal of follies that he and three appeal of follies that he and three sought after as unusual homes, partners have launched Pavilions of Splendour, an estate agency specialising in unusual buildings.

eral theme, are quoted in guineas. The follies on offer cost between one guinea and 1m guineas.

Most follies were expensive jokes with no utility other than as somewhere to store the croquet sticks or Another folly on the agency's list is Hadlow Tower, soaring 170ft built in 1838 as an addition to Hadlow Castle, built by William Barton May in the late 18th century and Pavilions of Splendour has some decidedly unsplended temptations as well; there is, for instance, Deepings Lodge, in Deene Park, Corby. Northamptonshire, which could be your home for just one guinea.

The snag is that the guinea buys a 21 year full repairing lease, and there is a lot of repairing to be done on the little 19th century stone lodge, plus the provision of main

After many years as a hospital, Craig-y-Nos Castle, in Abercraf, Powys, has been restored to the sort of elegance furnished by soprano Adelina Patti, who bought it in 1878. Patti built a scale replica of Bayreuth State Opera House, plus aviary, conservatory, winter gardens, chapel and many other rooms. Although much of the restoration is complete, there is potential for developing the remainder

This means the 550,000 guineas price guide could be just a start, but there is already a monthly turnover of about £30,000 from functions and musical events.

But is it fair to describe builders of what we call follies as eccentric? "My great-aunt Jessie would have said that her amphitheatre and temple of the winds were two of life's essentials," said John Blake, who inherited Clovers, in Tenby, from the old woman.

Jessie Allen lost her fiancé in the first world war and threw herself into a drama teaching career at Cheltenham College and at her Welsh clifftop home. Many a budding thespian had a first taste of Shakespeare in the amphitheatre.

Jessie's Indian-style bungalow has now been replaced with a five-bedroom, single-storey home, with distant views of Lundy and Caldy Island and the Devon coast. There are five acres of land sloping down to private, sandy beaches.

The amphitheatre, with tiered seats cut into the ground, has a raised stone stage. Nearby is the temple, built by Royal Academician Alan Strawbridge; it once had glass wind chimes suspended from its domed cupola. The house, land and follies are offered for 250,000 guineas. Knight, Frank and Rutley has had good year for Shropshire follies. After agreeing terms for two of the four follies at Weston Park, the firm now offers Sham Castle in Acton

Burnell, Shropshire. Built in the 1780s as a music room for the Bruce Smythe family who owned the surrounding estate, the folly was restored in the 1980s and is now a comfortable home with remarkable views. The hexagonal first-floor drawing room and its intricate plaster-work ceiling is especially beautiful. The agent eschews guineas, asking £185,000 for a 90-year lease.

Among a number of follies on the market is a little castle and a stone boat house on the Didlington Hall Estate, Norfolk; but Savills says a buyer will have to take on the 460-acres of lakes and farm and all the buildings as well. The original mansion was demolished in 1950 so this could be one of the best building "plots" in the land. Savills also moves with the times, giving the guide price in pounds -

submission of what was formerly judged on political grounds to the sometimes Irina Miroshnichenko, in her pleasant central Moscow flat, puts it this way: "There was censorship before, of course, but there was a lot of freedom

tion, and every town, almost, had its theatre or even opera house. Now, everything is commercial. Some things should be, of course, but in art, not everything." She has not escaped: she is building an apparently successful second career as a singer, with a Plaf-like number called Ah, Tak Zhal, or, in the French. Quel

Oleg Bakliashvill, another of Russia's best-known stage presences and a Russian parliamentarian, made the same point in parliament: Russian culture is on the verge of destroying itself. Having welcomed the market, artists now demand protection

There is only a small literature or drama of the new times. The contemporary drama by Alexander Galin, Sorry, about Jewish émigrés is nroductioi of On Golden Pond by the US dramatist Ernest Thompson proved more popular with Moscow audiences.

The American play's setting amid a wealthy family faced with the problems of age recalls the plot of the comically crude Mexican soap opera. The Rich Also Cry. This commands the largest audiences of any TV show from Brest to Vladivostock: the popularity of both reveal a deep need to escape to a fantastic world. For much of this century, Russian art was mummified in the socialist-realist forms favoured by Soviet leaders. It became less propagandist as the years went on, but kept at least a subliminal moral message and avoided themes such as criminality or overt criticism of the Communist party. Now the republics, including Russia, have begun a search, sometimes frenzied and discriminatory, for their own forms. This has often led them to kick out Russian cultural centres, as, for example, when the Latvian government closed down the famous Russian Youth Theatre in Riga. Despite the restrictions, Soviet art at the beginning of the century showed an extraordinary inventiveness, espe-cially the plastic arts, walled up and covered over with pseudo-classical heroics and Gothic imperialism.

musicians such as Shostakovich and film-makers such as Eisenstein, even though they were openly and humiliat-ingly brought to heel.

But the first products of the new freedom, such as the films of Govorukhin, are dour and resentful, most brilliant when evoking loss and dislocation.

It is unthinkable that such a fantastically rich culture could be permanently exhausted, but its recovery has yet to begin.

SPORT AND MOTORING

EIL KINNOCK was at his most talkative. He had rung twice during the day without getting through. Now the former leader of the opposition was in full flow. He wanted to talk about rugby and specifically the international championship, which begins this afternoon.

Whatever you might feel about his political views, Kinnock's thoughts on rugby are worth paying attention to. He attended the same school as John Dawes, the brilliant captain of the all-conquering British Lions of 1971. He has dabbled in refereeing and when his constituency duties permit he has coached mini rugby at London Welsh.

"Where would I put my tenner?" he mused aloud, and even on the other end of the telephone you could detect the smile of pleasure on his face as he considered the question. He, a patriot, was between a rock and a hard place, forced to express too much admiration for England, anxious not to write off

"England's backs are terrific footballers" said Kinnock. "If Rory Underwood played in the centre I would be very frightened. He has been under-exploited on the wing and he is such a great defender. Carling is so creative and courageous, Guscott is just magic to watch and Rob Andrew can do any-

In the end, though, Kinnock said he would not risk his money on England, suggesting there were too many imponderables for Will Carling's team to be a good bet for an unprecedented third grand slam in as many years. In this he is almost

Man for man England are far better than any other side. If you doubt this, compare each England player with his opposite number in the other countries. There are no Irishmen who are better, only one Welshman – Robert Jones is a more accomplished scrum-half than Dewi Morris - and only a couple of Scots and French.

Furthermore, I would back England against a side chosen from the best of the four other countries, such is the hegemony and commit-ment they have built up these past few years. If selection is based on talent alone, and nationalism is kept out of it, then England should provide a record total of players for the British Lions party to tour New Zealand this summer. The French at Twickenham this afternoon are one of the two serious threats to England even though they have lost the past five games against England. Pierre Berbizier, the French coach, talks about this game as one in which the quality of France's play is more important than the outcome. The French are anxious to forget the bad-tempered games against England in the World Cup in 1991 and the champimen were sent off during this latter game and later suffered a large measure of humbug and sanctimoniousness came from English

As the five nations battle starts, one backbencher speaks against the majority have a tendency to kick, which to the British smacks of cowardice because the victim is defenceless on the ground. But England are not angels either and Kinnock is not the only person who believes that the English forwards know how to antagonise their rivals and have exploited this dubious tactic to their

The new-look French team includes Jean-Francois Tordo, a flanker at hooker, which seems a dangerous, though typically French, idea. Furthermore, the French discathedral and speak of it as one might of a haunted building, as if shivers are running down their spines as they do so.

France on the right day might do it if everything goes their way," said Bob Dwyer, coach of the world champions, Australia. "On such a day France have the game to win though they have not developed much these past few years. But as long as England are right, I can't see them losing."

It will be no picnic for England against Wales at Cardiff where they lost, surprisingly, in 1989. Wales are moving ahead slowly. They need regular doses of dirty realism to puncture the sort of misguided optimism that burst out after they had beaten Ireland last season.

by one point and Tony Copsey was lucky not to be sent off for landing a punch on Neil Francis that would have done credit to Frank Bruno, if that is not being unfair to Copsey. It is true that it was Wales's first championship win since 1989 but it hardly justified the excitement that surrounded it. At the end of the game former internationals such as Brian Price, J J Williams, Barry John were cock-a-hoop. I heard one of them say: "It's the triple crown

Alan Davies and Bob Norster, as coach and manager respectively, have brought some realism to the national team. Their off-the-field organisation is almost as good as that of England and one cannot say fairer than that. Most of all, they need an on-the-field general in the way Dawes was when he captained Wales in the seventies.

Smooth path for Seles

HE DEFENDING champions and top seeds, Jim Courier and Monica Seles, were treated kindly in yesterday's draw at Flinders Park, Melbourne, for the A$7m (£3.1m) Ford Australian Open which starts there

Courier can face no-one ranked higher than 69 en route to the fourth round where his seeded opponent would be the young Spaniard Sergi Bruguera. The remarkable Seles, 19 and already the holder of seven Grand Slam titles, has a quiet quarter with either Gabriela Sabatini or Jana Novotna cast as her likely semi-final opponent. For-tunately for Seles the lively Spaniard, Arantxa Sanchez-Vicario, who beat her last year in Montreal, is in the lower half. So is another 1992 conqueror, the teenage Olympic champion, Jennifer Capriati of the US. These two will form the chief challenge to the No 2 seed Steffi Graf who no longer seems troubled by the ankle injury which hampered her last week when she and Michael Stich won the Hopman Cup for Germany for the first time.

It is impossible to look beyond Seles as the likely champion. She has lost only once in a Grand Slam final during the past two years - to Graf at last year's Wimbledon where her attempt to stille the natural grunt she emits whenever she strikes the ball ruined any chance she might have had of beating an in-form opponent. Already the double-handed world champion has issued a plea for understanding about this vexed question. "I said after Wimbledon that if I do grunt, great; if I don't grunt, great...I just can't stand everybody talking about it...it took so much away from my game, so I don't want to make an issue of it." Martina Navratilova (ranked 5) is the only woman among the top 30 who is missing. At 36 one can understand Martina's desire to harbour her reserves for a determined attack on a 10th Wimbledon title.

The most remarkable woman in Melbourne is not a player - at least, no longer a player. The former Bulgarian champion, Julia Maleeva (nee Berberian), is the mother of the three sisters Manuela, Katerina and Magdalena. All are seeded. This is a record. We should strike a medal in Julia's honour. No medals are due to the British nament since successfully defending his French Open title in June. An early loss would probably cost him the world No 1 ranking, either to his old friend and rival from their days at the Nick Bollettieri Academy, Pete Sampras, seeded No 3, or to Stefan Edberg, the No 2 seed.

It is a subject Courier does not like to dwell on. "As long as I am comfortable with the way I am playing, the ranking will take care of itself. It took a while to absorb all the pressures but I don't put extra pressure on myself by thinking too much about it" he says.

He has certainly looked comfortable enough in Adelaide this week in the Rio Slazenger Challenge, an eight man special event which he won last year. This sort of pressurefree match play on the same Rebound Ace surface and with the same balls provides excellent practice for Melbourne.

Edberg, is also in Adelaide with his wife Annette and his British coach Tony Pickard, but not vet completely free of the cold he picked up in Qatar last week where he lost in the semi-finals to Becker. Pickard said he was content with Stefan's draw which suggests a quarter-final against Ivan Lendi, recovered at last from a groin injury, or Wayne Ferreira of South Africa, a semi-finalist last year. Either Sampras or Goran Ivanisevic. the fifth seed, should be lying in wait in the semi-finals.

Becker's prospective fourth round match against fellow German Stich is a tantalising prospect for it was a loss to Stich in Hamburg last year that prompted Becker to seek help from Gunther Bresnick to improve his fitness. Anvone who saw Becker's superb form in winning the ATP Tour Championship last November will know just how successful their work together has been. Both Becker and Stich crave Germany so every meeting between them has a special significance. The lone British man in the draw is Wimbledon hero Jeremy Bates. He plays Heath Denman, a 22-year-old wild card from Queensland.

Skilng gear, both hardware and clothing, is becoming so non-intrusive that you hardly knows it is there. But even rugged Wranglers are more likely to be seen on British roads than slithering up and down hillsides or plunging into wader-deep water. Young drivers, dismayed by the cost of insuring hot hatchbacks, have been turning to what they perceive as sporty four-wheel drives.

I could live happily with a Cherokee as a road car, though I would find a Wrangler too much of a hair shirt. But Chrysler Jeep UK believes the Wrangler (from £12.495 with a 25 litre engine and five-speed gearbox) will give Suzuki's appeared 20 years ago. This is not just a question of new documentary sources or even the current preoccupation with the childhood traumas and sexual activities of our political leaders, male or female. The new feminist biographers, and Blanche Cook is one, insist that the issues of sex and power are as central to the study of women's public roles as men's and that women's passions can provide the key to their influence and

Rather than the dutiful wife of an American president sublimating her interests and passions. ER, as she is called throughout this account, is portrayed as an assertive and independent woman who created her own feminist agenda. Cook's biography is all the more provocative because in her own memoirs ER deliberately obscured the historical record, minimising her political ambitions and revealing almost nothing about her intimate private life. Her closest friends remained silent and, for the most part, concealed or destroyed the letters that would have opened Pandora's Box.

In this first volume of two, Professor Cook dwells on ER's complex inheri-tance, the alcoholic but adored father and the beautiful if shallow mother who died when Eleanor was eight. Eleanor's first moment of self discovery occurred at Allenswood School in London's Wimbledon, where the Strachey girls and other daughters of the enlightened, wealthy Anglo-American élite received a disciplined but liberating education.
In this heady emotional and intellectual atmosphere the orphaned ER flowered, gaining the inner self-confidence and broader range of sympathies so important to her later development.

The debutante, secret fiancée and then wife of Franklyn Roosevelt returned to New York to live the conventional life of her sex and class, distinguished only by a difficult relationship with her domineering mother-in-law, in whose house she and Franklyn lived, and by the sense of entrapment and depression that came to engulf the young mother of six. It was Franklyn's turn to politics and, above all, the shock of discovering his love affairs that opened ER's inner vyn Bragg rolled into one.

HIS biography of Eleanor encouraged Eleanor to become active in Roosevelt would not have the "new women's" political groups of the 1920s. Here she made her first femi-nist friends, including the political activists, Nancy Cook and Marion Dickerman, a lesbian couple who later lived in a cottage on the Roosevelt estate and with whom ER enjoyed an intimate per-sonal and professional relationship for over 15 years. As her husband climbed the political ladder, ER embarked on her own career in politics, journalism for women's magazines, and part-time teaching at a girls school bought and run by Eleanor and her friends.

Cook is particularly acute on the kind of bondage created by financial dependence, whether between mother and son or husband and wife, and its effects on the Roosevelt marriage and ER's quest for independence. She catches the tensions created by Eleanor's double life during the early stages of her husband's struggles with polio and the growing gap between ER's mother-wife and politician-teacher roles.

The personal compromises and the totally unliberated treatment of her own daughter suggest how incomplete was ER's emergence from the conven-tions of the times, despite her strong female friendships and an independent power position in an anti-feminist Democratic Party.

There is more in this volume about ER's emotional involvements than about her political activities though Professor Cook sees them as equal parts of the same story. These include not only Eleanor's close friendship with Nancy Cook and others but also her relationship with Earl Miller, the handsome, young bodyguard who became her companion, defender and champion.

The volume ends with the Roosevelts' move into the White House and the start of what is described here as Eleanor's lesbian affair with Lorena Hicks, the Associated Press's senior woman reporter. With so much of the evidence missing and final conclusions always a question of judgment, Cock follows up every lead and includes every detail.

If only she had used a more delicate brush when filling in the political background and selected a wider range of colours when dealing with her male pol-iticians, we might have been spared some of the all too numerous illustrations of FDR's shallow and opportunistic political convictions: Professor Cook's claim that men enter politics for personal fulfilment while women try to get things done is, even in terms of ER's odyssey, open to question. A good feminist biography does not need to fight the war of the sexes.

Commercial reasons apart, the decision to conclude the volume in 1933 raises questions about the feminist approach to historical biography. In the not-so-distant past, when little was known about the intimacies discussed here, it was ER's outspoken political views and public causes that made her an exceptional presidential wife and the focus of interest and intense debate. Is it a hopelessly outdated suggestion to say that the sexual life of any statesman or stateswoman is only of historical interest because of what they did or accomplished?

If this first volume, written from a feminist perspective, brilliantly casts its subject in a radically different light, the next must locate her in a broader context involving issues that go far beyond those of power and pleasure. It still remains to be seen where ER should stand in the pantheon of feminist heroines. The focus on who she was and how she lived makes sense only because of Eleanor's subsequent political and humanitarian contributions.

If Cook finds the right balance between ER's private and public worlds, she will not just have created a stir at a time when Hillary Clinton comes to Washington but will have significantly advanced the cause of feminist biography. As someone who regularly read Eleanor Roosevelt's syndicated My Day column, I found this a fascinating and revealing, if disturbing, book. I wait to read the next volume.

Even at the height of his fame the image of Wells as a jolly uncle at a family Christmas party was not accepted wholly uncritically. Rebecca West, in a famous essay she wrote after her great affair with him was over, had serious reservations about his work: "All our youth [she wrote] they hung about the houses of our minds like Uncles, the Big Four [Bennett, Shaw, Calsworthy and Wells] ... uncle as one could hope to have."
Wells was livid. "The thing" he wrote in a private letter to her, "is a lie and a damned stupid one. You can go through all my books and list the woman characters, not a bad lot from Aunt Pondervo to Joan and from Ann Pornick to the Meanuchile women – and you can't find three pages to justify this spiteful rubbish". Rebecca's affair with Wells. We have already been through it several times in earlier biographies and viewed it from the points of view of all the principal players - including that of Anthony West, the fruit of the affair. Coren has had access to the Wells papers in the University of Urbana, Illinois and he interviewed Anthony West before he died. Coren's chapter, "A Woman of Some Importance", is the best researched part of his book. Here are the main events of the affair from the standpoint of a detached observer.

Indeed, Coren has written a nunchy stimulating book, if over-selective in its treatment of the vast material. He deals much more more briskly with most of the other mistresses, dispatching Moura Budberg - whom Wells said was one of the few women he really loved - in half a sentence. Nor does Coren seem to realise quite what a feat it was for this son of a housekeeper and a professional cricketer to gatecrash an Edwardian literary world run by the darlings of the country house set like Harry Cust, another great Don Juan of the time. He appears here as Harry "Crust" - a misprint but rather an apt name for him. Coren seems unaware too that Wells was in New York in 1941 lecturing at the behest of the British Ministry of Information. The lectures were a flop. Maugham, who heard them, commented on his old friend: "he has always been too busy to be much of a philosopher". Coren's book makes the same point at rather greater length.

Game, set, match to the mandarins

FINANCIAL TIMES WEEKEND JANUARY 16/JANUARY 17 1993

HIS is a very remarkable book, not only for its contents but also on account of its structure. It is very long - 621 pages dealing with the 22 months that it took Lord McCartney to take his diplomatic mission to China and back. He hoped to establish an embassy at the Celestial Court. He failed utterly, so 600 pages may seem a very generous amount of space and the method adopted by Peyrefitte may seem leisurely indeed. The art of Peyrelitte lies in his use of chapters. Chapter I begins with McCartney's departure from Portsmouth on September 26 1792; 80 chapters later, on September 6 1794. McCartney drops his anchor in Portsmouth, his mission completed. Each day of McCartney's journey is covered; no chapter is less than three pages and none more than nine. This could have led to tedious monotony but Peyrefitte at times allows himself to cover considerable periods in short chapters - the outward and inward journeys, for instance, mentioning only incidents such as stopping at St Helena on the way back.

However, he uses these repetitive days of sailing very neatly: on the journey from Madeira to the Cape Verde Islands, for example, he sketches the political and social climate in which McCartney had pursued his career and, in the next chapter, as they skim along before the trade winds, the outlines of his biography are covered and the structure of his character delineated.

Once China is reached the chronological tempo is diminished: chapters cover a few days, some only one. And here the longueurs are again avoided by discussions of Chinese food, buildings, dress, agriculture, women's feet, pederasty among the Mandarins, etc. The history and geography of China in general, and of the Manchu world in particular, are conveyed with remarkable economy and clarity and, when the long journey is completed, not only is the enormity of the disaster revealed but so is its inevitability.

During the journey Peyrefitte weaves a vivid tapestry. He brings alive the Chinese countryside, the harshness and monotony of the landscape of the north, and the vivid subtropical South with its richness of colour and abundance of produce. He brings home to us the vast size of the Chinese Empire with its teeming peas-antry and multitudinous craftsmen and merchants, outpopulating Europe, including

THE COLLISION OF TWO CIVILISATIONS: THE BRITISH EXPEDITION TO CHINA

1792-4 by Alain Peyrefitte HarperCollins £20, 621 pages

For four thousand years, in spite of civil wars, the infiltration of Buddhism and thousands of peasant uprisings, the institutions of government had strengthened, not weakened. Furthermore, China had enjoyed a considerable technological advantage over the world beyond its bounds, especially in hydraulics. Peyrefitte makes us see how reasonable was the mandarins' and emperors' monumental conceit and why they regarded McCartney's eruption into their world as an unseemly irritant to be got rid of, with courtesy but minimal cordiality, as soon as possible

As chapter follows chapter the characters - McCartney, his deputy Staunton and his scientists and artists - become rounded personalities. Peyrefitte understands their bafflement, at times their wonder. but, more importantly, he es as day follows day the growth of a more critical attitude towards the Chinese and their society, with the filth, the disease, the absurd dependence on necromancy, the attitude to women. For McCartney their utter failure to show the slightest interest in the Western technological marvels which he had brought the emperor as presents completed his disilla. sion. Voltaire's image of China (based on self-flattering reports from Jesuit missionaries) as a well-ordered state created by philosophers - stable, rich, with outstanding technical skill and effortless wisdom vanished.

McCartney now realised that the Chinese empire would never change, except through force. As Peyrefitte so wisely points out, even force and decades of Maoist communism have been unable to break down these cultural attitudes that have been building up like a coral reef for 4000 years. Hatred and fear of foreigners, the rock-like belief that the Chinese way is always the best, and best interpreted by aged men, still persist. Chris Patten should read this book.

Although most of what Peyrefitte writes about is based on the work of scholars, he has discovered two new sources of the highest value which he uses with skill: one, the annotations made by the emperor himself in scarlet ink on edicts and documents relating to the embassy, and the other an astonishing, clear-eyed, perceptive diary of young Thomas Staunton, a boy of 12, the only Englishman on McCartney's staff to speak, write and read Chinese. By the time he returned home at 14 he had come to the right conclusion that it would take war to break open China; he spent his life promoting it.

This is a wonderful book. a work of very high intelligence and remarkable clarity, suffused with wisdom and a deep sense of the problems of human existence and cultures. It is a very great achievement and the small chapters make it easy to devour.

N Lawrence in love. there are two stories. In the first Lawrence the hero was a sexual prophet who understood women and whose Lady Chatterley obscenity trial hastened the sexual revolution of the 1960s. About 20 years ago, this character began to be challenged by Lawrence Coren gives yet another account of 1 the villain, a puritanical misogynist who wrote about women's sexuality to compensate for his inability in life to relate to them, and whose books still encourage patriarchal oppres-

This new account of Lawrence's lovers and friends extends the debate. Elaine Feinstein is perceptive and sympathetic, though offering neither a scholarly nor a radically new approach. But the old anecdotes are told with verve and pace; by condensing so many tales of friendships broken, romance ruined by fear, Feinstein draws a compelling portrait of a man whose defensive dogmatism wrecked his and other lives.

Creativity and sexuality are threaded together in Lawrence as in no other writer, so the story of his women is at once the story of his life and the mainspring of his work. A sickly mother's boy who loathed his coal miner father - "now we are going to be very happy while Father is away," he announced when his father had an accident - Lawrence was a hit with the opposite sex from the start.

John Worthern, in his superb biography D.H. Lawrence: the Early Years (1991), argued that Frieda's influence led Lawrence to see women's liberation in overwhelmingly sexual terms women, like Jessie Chambers. felt as oppressed by class and lack of education as by sexual convention.

Feinstein, by contrast, charts his work as the response to Frieda's voracious demands and his own sexual terror. It surfaces desperately in the poems ("Why were we crucified into sex?") and in The Plumed Serpent, which pre-scribed female passivity and denied satisfaction as a moral duty. It is also the undercurrent of Women in Love, about "the difficulty in finding salvation through sexual love", and Lady Chatterley, written when Lawrence, like Sir Clifford, was impotent and his wife was betraying him with a younger, wilder man. Feinstein is excellent on Lawrence's mask of cruelty to cover weakness - denying his own TB, he called the tubercular Katherine Mansfield a rep tile "stewing in consumption" whom he hoped would die. Bertrand Russell, receiving a viperish letter which accused him of "repressed mental blood lust", decided Lawrence "led straight to Auschwitz". Lawrence's refusal to face his own repressions created psychologically dishonest characterisations, such as Birkin, the self-portrait in Women in Love. Feinstein is not the last word on the fiction or on the life, but

Vessels, a collection of non-fic-tion by one of that country's most under-rated short story writers. Like his fellow realists Carver, Ford and Wolff, Andre Dubus is a grunt in the army of American literature, working his way slowly yet relent-lessly through the battlefield debris of his nation's daily life. His non-fiction bears the same virtues as his stories - reso-lute honesty, detailed percep-

job of chasing foul balls for his local, woebegone baseball team. There is also a memorable account of a cross-country train ride, as well as a shocking brush with America's constipated legal system. These essays are followed by examinations of the pitfalls of a career as a short story writer, the book's weakest section, that should appeal mostly to fellow authors.

The last group of essays deals with what is no doubt the meat of the book - the horrific injuries Dubus suffered in a 1986 car crash, leaving him confined to a wheelchair. Dubus writes about his plight with unblinking hon-esty, whether it be the effect of his paralysis on his young marriage or the terror of watching helplessly as his one- year-old daughter severs her finger. The ex-Marine even finds it hard to stand up to a lout in a theatre. not out of fear but rather because "if you confront a man from a wheelchair you're bully-ing him. Only a coward would hit. hit a man in a chair." Fiction writers such as Dubus are often judged by their ability to cast a cold eye on imagined tragedy. It is a testimony to Dubus's skill and integrity that he is able to bring this dispassionate vision to bear on a very real, very personal crisis.

HE DAUGHTERS are massing on the skyline. The come-lately biographers are gathering on the tree-branches. And the publishing industry is racing about the land signing Death in show business is a grim spectacle. No sooner has a deceased legend completed his or her lying-in than the body is taken out to the vultures. Is there anything new to be said about Dietrich? Oh, yes. Lots and lots, according to these two books. There she is, the goddess with the smoky voice and hooded eyes, peering out from the two interchange-able black bookjackets with an interchangeable Mona Lisa smile, daring portraitists to penetrate that enigma called a

Maria Riva, Dietrich's daughter, offers a family perspective on the legend. What was it like sharing a house with Mum, Dad, Josef Von Sternberg, Mercedes De Acosta (lesbian lover), Erich Maria Remarque, a dog, a maid and anyone else who happened to be passing by with suggestions as to make-up, love life or career direction. Steven Bach, a former United Artists executive and author of the Heaven's Gate hatchet job, Final Cut, goes for the movie angle. Onward we trawl through Morocco, Shanghai Express and Touch of Evil, seeking the constant Dietrich in the changing movie character.

But of course the movie character never did change. Dietrich was as immovable as a Caryatid through her seven great Von Sternberg films. (Not all were great individually, but taken whole the septet was a mythopoeic masterpiece). She did let the odd hair down in Destry Rides Again fourth hair from the left, if I recall - and she let a whole wig down as the cockney-impersonating murderess in Witness for the Prosecution. But it was the same Dietrich, whether hieratic or histrionic. easy because she never did

Yet she obsesses the entire world. In neither book do we quite find why, though Bach's 600 well-researched pages are written with wit and vivacity. He tunes in to Dietrich's camp charm and the absurdist culde-sacs of her (best) movie plots. Of The Scarlet Empress: "There is a war going on. Fin-land? Doesn't matter. Back to the real battlefield - the bedroom." And he responds to Sternberg the stylist's dazzling line in petrified exoticism. I laughed out loud when I read that Clive Brook came to Shanghai Express having just had a face-lift. As if a movie needed two main characters with paralysed face-muscles. Bach enjoys the backstage secrets of the movie business. Dietrich's "tape lifts" (hitching her facial skin up to bestow instant youth); Charles Boyer's sandblown, accident-prone wig in The Garden of Allah; Stern-berg's command that all the actors speak in the click-clack rhythm of trains in Shanghai Express. But he never, we feel. quites knits the minutiae to the macro-picture.

Dietrich became a star by bowing to all these imperatives. But she bowed in a spirit not of obsequiousness but of lordly, luminous passivity. There was a divine scorn in her obedience: a scorn that came out later in Maximilian Schell's spellbinding documentary Mariene (Bach has a good passage on its making). When Schell recorded the cranky star in Paris at age 82, she kept calling everything she ever did in movies "quatsch", German slang for tripe. But the disdain she poured on her own legend was, of course, the disdain that made that legend.

If Bach does not join all the dots, Dietrich's daughter Maria Riva scarcely joins any. Her book's most inspired episode -Bach would have made a meal of it - is thrown away. It depicts Dietrich on a farm, dressed in a peach-satin dress-ing gown and using for lubricant Elizabeth Arden's Blue Grass Facial Oil. This beats even the high heels kicked into the sand at the end of Morocco or the pre-firing-squad lipstick in Dishonoured.

Riva does not seem to possess a sense of humour. Elsewhere her book is at once frank and elusive. Flying into the star's orbit like moths around the flame are such exotics as Ernest Hemingway, Fritz Lang, Maurice Chevalier and Mercedes Da Acosta (or, as Clifton Webb dubs her in a quoted letter, Countess Dracula da Acosta). This gaunt vampira (see picture page 147) was Greta Garbo's cast-off Sapphic friend and may or not have become Dietrich's.

But then may-or-may-nots abound. While Riva regales us with some melodramatic certainties from her own life, including teenage rape by a quasi-protectress foisted on her by Mum, the portrait of Dietrich becomes fogged by the ever more prolix confusion of perhaps-lovers, floating friends and quoted-at-length correspondents. Whenever Riva sharpens focus, it is to be unflattering: from the 49 tormenting takes it took the new German star to enunciate her virtual first word in a Hollywood movie - "Help" - to the final Sunset Boulevard-ish melodrama of Dietrich's dying days. "Her once translucent skin is parchment. She exudes an odour of booze and human decay...Her snores are ragged, spittle trails from her furrowed lips. Like a foetus she lies, bony hands cradling a sunken cheek . . . "

With daughters like this who needs demonographers? Domestic intimacy being what it is, we learn facts about Dietrich from Riva that we could learn from no-one else. But often they are spiteful, partial facts, conjured not for improved portraiture, one suscism. Bach's book, a more traditional fan-heated tour through the career, gets us closer to Dietrich the diva and to the strength of her lofty, luminous indifference. If "being" not "doing" is the true condition of stardom. Dietrich "was" more radiantly and effortlessly than anyone else in

Moved by The Deep Blue Sea

Malcolm Rutherford hails the revival of Rattigan's play at the Almeida theatre

Blue Sea struck me as one of the best and most moving English plays I had read when I first came across it as a boy in the 1950s. At school we read John Osborne's Look Buck in Anger at about the same time. It seemed odd to discover from the Sunday newspapers that Osborne had knocked Rattigan off the stage because there was no place left for a well-made play with good manners. For Rattigan and the young Osborne had at least one thing in common: they were masters of their craft. We were astonished by the fickleness of the London critics.

With hindsight one can see that Rattigan's demotion had more to do with fashion than with his abilities as a writer. His characters were too upper middle class to have their emotions taken seriously. Such reverse snobbery is now, I hope, behind us.

The Deep Blue Sea gets even better with time. There is one particular scene which must bring a lump to the throat of all but the subhuman. It comes early on when Hester Collyer has just tried to commit suicide by the gas fire and is faced with Sir William, the husband from whom she has estranged herself, now a QC. One particular line, too. They talk about the dinner parties they used to give in Eaton Square, and which are still given by Sir William. Hester comes back to her old social self to ask with genuine curiosity and affection: "Is David very pompous now he's Solicitor-General?" How anyone could have thought such dialogue is artificial is beyond me. Here is one of the most poignant scenes you will

Yet although this is the gem, The Deep Blue Sea is not a one-scene play. There is pathos, wit, drama and even a touch of suspense all through. If you have never seen it before, ask yourself at the interval how you expect it to end. Probably you will guess right, but not with total confidence.

gan's The Deep in leaving her husband for a young lover and is articulate enough to explain her motives. In Karel Reisz's production at the Almeida, she is played by Penelope Wilton. Whenever she is on stage, which save for one scene is practically all the time, it is impossible to take your eyes off her. Ms Wilton works by having magnificent poise: very still, very determined, none of the nervous twitchings of a Hedda Gabler. She does nothing, even have an occasional spasm, without thinking. I doubt if Peggy Ashcroft, who first played the part in 1952, did it better. Hester is nothing, however, without a man. She needs the best possible male supporting cast to go with her. In Nicholas Jones as her husband, she gets it. Jones is very tall, very suave, the epitome of the well-dressed, well-educated, well-off, emotionally inarticulate Englishman. Without Jones to play against, Ms Wilton's performance would not be nearly so effective. The hardest part nowadays is that of Freddie, Hester's lover. Possibly this is where the play dates. He was a crack pilot in the RAF in 1940, a top test pilot just after the war, but clapped out by the time he was 25. The emotional impact of that is no longer what it was, If the play had been written slightly later, Hester might have fallen for a Jimmy Porter. Nevertheless, under Reisz's direction, Linus Roache does all that can be done with the material.

The other outstanding performance is by Wojtek Pszoniak as the East European doctor who has been struck off the medical register, presumably for what was then indecency. The play has a history of being really about Rattigan's own homosexual feelings. Pszoniak eyes Freddie's male friend in a way to bring this out: he also saves

Parry, an almost Elgar

IJRERT Parry was almost, but not quite, the Elgar of his day. Elgar acknowledged the kinship. Scholars have spent the years since Parry's death in 1918 trying to explain the shortfall.

Much of Parry's achievement was against the odds. His mother died soon after his birth and a youthful heart condition persistently interrupted his career. His doting marriage conferred some income, but its stability hinged on a frail, hypochondriac wife and insipid aristocratic relations.

Parry was a classic victim of the late-19th century Brahms-Wagner divide. His traditional grounding in harmony and counterpoint often threatened to muzzle his thematic invention. He revered Brahms, but his instincts lay with Bayreuth, whither, with his mentor and champion, the Liszt pupil Edward Dannreuther, he made ritual pilgrimages, like tious, he strove unsuccessfully to resolve the futile Elgar-Stanford feud and was the principle inspiration to young composers of the successor generation.

Tensions were inevitable: between academia and sufficient time for gestation and composition (his output, including chamber, organ music and a dozen volumes of songs, was vast); between symphonic writing, at which he

pantheistic or humanist "ethical" cantata, to a medley of texts by Browning, Bridges or himself, brought mixed suc-cess. Had he allowed his Weimar inclinations unashamed rein, like Delius with A Mass of Life, he might have caught the spirit of an era. His best efforts, endlessly revised, remain uplifting, if bitty: their blend of rearguard diatonicism and proselytising text can appear bland.

Jeremy Dibble's critical biography - the first for six decades - is as welcome as it is overdue. Parry's family background (he inherited his painter father's estate near Gloucester) and struggle for early recognition while working for Lloyd's of London, are well charted. Elected a member of the Royal Yacht Squadron in 1908, his relaxation involved sailing a 73-foot ketch from Sussex to the coast of Galway, or entertaining friends like Burne-Jones, Balfour and Mrs Pankhurst, whose demonstrations he espoused.

This is an enthusiastic. painstakingly researched book. backed by generous, inter-spersed musical examples. It discerningly attempts for Parry something akin to what Percy M. Young's Elgar, O.M. did for his successor. Some of the wordier analysis preserves a ring of the doctoral thesis. But the judgments are neither dogmatic nor cloying. Parry's correspondence and diaries have been left dormant too long. that Dr. Dibble has restored them and reassessed the music deserves our gratitude, Anyone who has seen her in Lost in Yonkers or answering long-distance telephone-calls in television ads, will know something of Maureen Lipman's peculiar charm; but what is so special about her life? Precisely that it is like the lives of so many of us, and that in "When's It Coming Out?" she recounts it so delightfully. The series ends on the 18th, but you can buy it on a BBC Radio Collection cassette and hear the lot.

I was unfair last week to label Craig Brown's and Myles Kington's new series "unpromising" after hearing only one day's worth of each. Having heard two more of both, I confirm my judgment. Brown's lines for veteran broadcaster "Wallace Arnold" in Welcome to my Wireless are quite bare of wit, and Harry Enfield's funny voices add nothing. Kington interviews the famous dead, this week Robinson Crusoe (next, Mona Lisa). The dodge is to ask about the matters they are reputed for and find that they do not want to discuss them. Kington has an amusing manner, but his thrusts are often predictable.

I must also be unfair to Roger Graef's five-strong series, Living Dangerously, which began last Sunday. He interviews young criminals, and I can't tell if the next four will be as interesting as the first was. Bobby, its subject, came from a rough, broken family, lived in sundry homes, stole cars, thieved to buy "grass" (he needed about £30 a day), only burgled "rich" houses, carried a knife but never used it. After a course at Sherborne House under the Probation service, he thieves no more, has begun a computer course. It would at least be unfair not to draw attention to such things.

ONT, that conspicuous ornament of pre-War Punch, got it just about right in his studies of "The British Character". There she sits, the little old lady confidently at work in the picturesque French town, her easel set up smack between the tramlines in the middle of the street while the awed populace, down to the cat and dog, looks on. Yes, we do pride ourselves as a nation on having, as his caption puts it, "The gift of water colours".

That we should thus fix upon what we also instinctively characterise as a minor form of the art of painting is a nice point. For, if this magnificent exhibition at the Academy does nothing else, it demonstrates for ever the absurdity of the distinction that would make oil on canvas inherently superior to water-colour on paper, simply because it is oil on canvas. We have only to look to Thomas Rowlandson, almost exclusively a water-colourist and draughtsman, to take the proof.

Yet he, one of our most particular and engaging artists, is oddly under-represented here. The question hangs in the air: would he, even now, be taken more seriously had he chosen to work principally in oil on canvas? John Frederick Lewis, the outstanding mid-Victorian water-colourist, whose Orientalist subjects such as "Life in the Harem" and "The Pipe-bearer" were the sensation of the 1850s, was later forced to switch to the more profitable oil, simply to make a living. Clearly the prejudice is nothing new.

Yet again, going through the show, it remains inescapeable that few of the artists, the greatest among them especially, from Turner, Bonington and Constable to Whistler, were exclusive specialists. The truth is that painting of any kind is an extremely practical business and artists work in whichever medium is most appropriate, or simply available, to their immediate purpose. It may be more lasting and resilient, but oil paint is heavy and canvas cumbersome. The natural portability of water-colour, its flexibility of execution and speed of drying are obvious advantages, the more so in a time when to be a landscape painter was to be a traveller, and the British painter the most inveterate traveller of all.

That water-colour should also be as tricky and testing a medium as any, requiring at any level considerable sophistication of technique, is an irony quite lost in the enthusiasm of the amateur. In particular it requires a commitment and decision that may be as extreme as anything of Zen calligraphy and the formal conventions. In the first period and introductory section - under the somewhat stuffy label of The Structure of Landscape: 18th century Theory - come Alexander Cozens and William Gilpin with their random blots in practice and their theories of the romantic and picturesque landscape. That they should actually achieve images of forest, lake and mountain so close in spirit to the idealised landscapes of the Chinese mas-ters must have been a matter of intuitive sympathy, for the fact passes unremarked in the accompanying texts.

Throughout there is more than enough of infinite charm to satisfy any more literal and descriptive taste, from the topographical studies of Paul Sandby, to the townscapes of Samuel Prout and Thomas Shotter Boys, to the undergrowth tracery of John Ruskin and the birds' nests of William Hunt. Even so, it is ever that technical engagement that, in its free-est and most abstracted expression, takes the breath away. Turner, greatest of the artists, supplies the thread that pulls the show together through its several thematic sections, but he is also the best known and so not, for once, the star.

Rather it is David Cox on Rhyl Sands, or perhaps Thomas Girtin in the Rue St. Denis, or John Middleton in a shady lane, or Linnell and Whistler with their grey seas and sailing boats, or Peter de Wint, or John Sell Cotman: passim whichever we are looking at, for its broad, radical simplicity of image, its expressive spread of paint, its swift, comprehending, compre-

The Bolshoy exposed

Clement Crisp on the difficulties of dancing at the Albert Hall

ATCHING the Bolshoy Bal-let in the Albert Hall is an odd and slightly disorientating experience. There, exposed on a large and unflattering thrust stage, is one of the world's greatest dance companies - or two-thirds of it this is not the full 250-strong ensemble straining every muscle to tell us about the physical exhibaration of its way of moving. And there, brightly visible, is the BBC Concert orchestra, playing excellently, and providing an alternative spectacle when - as during the infinitely tedious Legend of Love on Friday night you have to look away from a horde of rhubarbing men dressed like Ali Baba and his forty chums. (Compliments to the two trumpeters who dealt so featly with Arif Melikov's Brummagem score.) And no less obviously there, the packed and encircling ranks of the audience, well illuminated by the light-spill from the stage. "What can they see so far round to the side?" you wonder. Excellent views of head-gear and the zip-fastenings at the back of the cos-tumes. I'd hazard, though Yury Grigorovich has been a pains to spread his dances wide and open them out to as much of the

who has watched the company in many theatres, I recognise some of the qualities I love with the troupe. Grandeur of scale, certainly, and dedication to the idea of performance - nothing perfunctory, or time-serving in interpretation. On these terms, the suite from Ivan the Terrible, which opened Thursday's programme, was the best thing so far, and the one most "like" its original in the theatre. The sweeping crowd of boyars and guards, and the Tsar's full-throttle hysteria, that make the fabric of the piece, were potent, and though Alexander Vetrov and Alia Mikhalchenko could not efface memories of earlier interpreters of Ivan and his beloved Anastasia, the fire of Grigorovich's theatrical vision blazed truly, and in Andrey Uvarov we saw a magnificent Kurbsky – and a magnificent young dan-

But the irresistible sweep of a performance in the theatre, that marvellous sense in which we can be drawn into a production by Bolshoy unity of style and devotion to the artistic cause of a ballet, is inevitably missing. The Nutcracker was a perfunctory batch of divertissements and under proper conditions Grigorovich's staging is touching and magical -while the Legend of Love suite must surely have proved incomprehensible to an audience on dramatic terms. I have always thought it Grigorovich's weakest work -because ethnically quaint about Persia -and at the Albert Hall it looked as if far too many people were impersonating Wilson, Keppel and Betty in their convolsingly sober sand-dance. It also lasted a thousand and one nights. Maybe more.

And as I suggested in earlier comment the principals' performances are under-mined by the lack of a proscenium arch to frame their interpretations, and are dwarfed by the spaces of the hall around them. (Extraordinary to write that about Bolshoy dancers whose artistry in the past has seemed to reach out of the theatre to touch the world.) Yet if the company has not yet shown us talents to rival those of recent seasons - Bessmertnova, Semenyaka, Ananiashvili, Mukhamedov. Posokhov, Fadeyechev – it remains the Bolshoy still, by force of dance presence and by the grand distinction of its manner. But it is also the Bolshoy in the market place, a victim of the need for hard currency, for bigger halls and bigger bucks. And that is bad news.

O ONCE again a dam-aged Eros has had to be removed from its plinth in Piccadilly Circus, and Westminster City Council seems content to spend at least £30,000 repairing Alfred Gilbert's statue of the god of love in time for another reveller to smash it up. Since the GLC invested fim in a great refurbishment in the 1980s, Eros has been nothing but trouble.

Yet there is an easy, artistically acceptable, solution. Roger de Grey, president of the nearby Royal Academy, wants to provide a permanent home for the original Eros. He is prepared to pay £40,000 towards a replacement for the Circus.

And the joy of the scheme is that the replacement would not be some latter day copy. Gilbert's original plaster of Eros still exists, in the Victoria & Albert Museum, and Gilbert's original dealers, the Fine Art Society, has the right to make ten casts from the plaster. It has already made eight and sold six of them, for £140,000 each.

There is an Eros in Vermont, another in Pennsylvania, and one has just been sold to Japan. The idea is to make ter, but to re-inforce internally the horizontal leg of the statue, the one that sticks out, which is the weak spot and the target for the wreckers.

So Piccadilly Circus will get a stronger Eros, and the RA a world famous exhibit. The FAS would offer a discount to add to the RA's contribution, and Westminster would be well advised spending the money it is lavishing on the repairs on completing the deal.

It is much easier to tempt companies into sponsoring the arts is going to be boosted by a national mood. Just as striking should be the 11 works commissioned by pop star and major collector, Peter Gabriel. Gabriel chose the artists, sent them tracks from his new album, US, and waited for inspiration to hit them. The much admired Andy Goldsworthy only received the lyrics of a song on a fax, but went out and moulded a nest of twigs and branches in a dusty hollow created by the drought near his Scottish home. He then watched as the rains came and washed away his creation, but the photograph is now in the Gabriel collection. Antique dealers always say

Comeback for Czech conductor

OR MORE than 20 years, the Czech conductor Martin Turnovsky was coldshouldered by artist agencies in the west. The Communist authoritles in Czechoslovakia never forgave him for emigrating after the Soviet invasion in 1968, and put pressure on anyone who tried to engage him. As a result, he was unable to work in any of the world's major musical centres. Now 64. Turnovsky has begun to make up for lost time. The past year has seen him re-emerge as an inspirational force in Prague's opera and concert life, and this month he brings the Prague Symphony Orchestra on tour

Turnovsky was one of the most talented Czech musicians of his generation, but by his own admission, he has had a stop-go career. The son of music-loving parents in Prague, he spent the final months of the war in a Nazi concentration camp. He won the Besancon conductors' competition in 1958 - but Czechoslovakia's isolationist policy prevented him from travelling abroad for the next five years. He became music director in Dresden in 1966, but for most of the 1970s and 1980s was treated as a non-person in the Communist bloc. Today he has none of the recording contracts or high media profile of the star conductor. What he can offer instead is long experience, a broad repertoire, human warmth and the ability to get results - qualities instantly recognised by the Prague Symphony Orchestra when Turnovsky returned to the Czech capital in 1991 after 21 years' exile.

His concerts lifted morale and playing standards. Here were all the virtues of old-world music-making cleanly-sculpted performances, free of idiosyncracy or blemish. The integrated sound and unforced musicality Turnovsky drew from the orchestra seemed to tap a vital part of the Czech musical heritage.

Ironically, Turnovsky had received a similar offer in 1970. "For a while after 1968, the government was still quite liberal," he recalls. "I had resigned my post in Dresden in protest at East Germany's collusion with the Soviet invasion, but we could still travel. When I conducted at the 1970

Prague Spring Festival. I was asked to succeed Václav Smetáček (the Prague Symphony Orchestra's music director]. But by then the atmosphere had changed - I realised it was our last chance to leave the country legally. It was a painful decision.

Turnovsky was denounced and given a prison sentence in his absence. He was dropped by international artist agencies, including Harold Holt in London, which were anxious to preserve their links with the Czech state concert agency -the source of a plentiful supply of cheap, high-quality musicians. "Everything was poisoned". He received a lifeline from George Szell, music director of the Cleveland Orchestra, who had befriended the Turnovsky family in Prague in the 1930s. His former teacher, Karel Ancerl, invited him to Toronto. Rafael Kubelik also helped. In 1975 he became music director of the Norwegian Opera Company in Oslo, and later moved to Bonn. His British opera debut came in 1988, when his Onegin with WNO was praised for its combination of passion and sensitivity. In recent years he has given a conducting class at the Musikhochschule in Graz and seen his sons prosper: one is principal bassoon of the Vienna Philharmonic, the other has a solo career as an oboeist. Since Turnovsky's return to Prague, he has conducted Otello at the Smetana Theatre (to be followed next month by Un ballo in maschera) and started rebuilding the Prague Symphony Orchestra's audiences. The financial rewards of such a commitment are few which is probably why so few emigré musicians have returned on an extended basis. Nor can be escape the problems of an orchestra which is still coming to terms with the limits of democracy and the need to generate more income. But unlike the Czech Philharmonic, which is still divided over its appointment of a German, Gerd Albrecht, as music director, the Prague Symphony Orchestra knew its chief selling point was its Czech tradition. "They asked me to work with them, and if they think I can help, it's my duty," says Turnovsky. "The musicians realise they now live in a competitive world, so there's a special effort. The potential is great. Technically they're playing well, but I'm trying to get the strings to play with more heart and a wider dynamic range."

The programmes for the British tour were arranged before Turnovsky's appointment, and include the usual helping of Smetana and Dvořák, plus the two Brahms string concertos. Turnovsky would have liked to include a Martinu symphony, but is pleased at the amount of Janáček: Newcastle and Leeds, for example, will hear the Talich arrangement of the Suite from The Cunning Little Vixen, while the London concert at the Royal Festival Hall on January 24 includes the Glagolitic Mass. Turnovsky counts it as one of the most exciting pieces written this century and also one of the most complicated. The first time I heard it was in Prague, conducted by the young Kubelik. It was an overwhelming experience for me. I hope it will have the same effect when we play it in

The Prague Symphony Orchestra's tour (January 21-30) opens in Dublin and continues Eastbourne, Leeds, London, Newcastle, Huddersfield, Middlesborough and Birmingham.

West, however, shrewdly discarded spades on the diamond winners. Declarer was able to throw three spades from dummy. This left a fivecard end-position. West held four hearts and the club knave, dummy had ace of spades. queen and five of hearts, and two clubs, while declarer held two spades and his three heart honours. South led a spade, and West ruffed to defeat the

Before he tackles diamonds,it is essential to cash one spade. Now the defence cannot beat the contract. West will throw snades as before on the diamonds, but in the fourcard ending, dummy will have no spade. Declarer ruffs his spade with dummy's heart queen, and claims his contract.

Dr Norman Myers believes that population is still the most important issue

HE FAMINES are returning, and so are the population experts to scare us with their sums. But if their projections are even halfcorrect, why do we pay so little heed to My consultants told me to go and see Norman Myers. Dr Myers is no two-bit Jeremiah: he advises governments and institutions such as the World Bank, the OECD, United Nations and European Commission. He is not afraid of upsetting politically-correct Greens by proposing market solutions. But even he resorts to the occasional shocker.

"In terms of the amount it consumes and pollutes, the average British family has not two children but more like 30 or

So it's at the expense of others that we

'Yes. And that applies to all the other Are you saying that a British or American baby is stealing from, say, a Bangladeshi baby: "I wouldn't quite use that term. I would say our increasing population and affluence - dependent on artificially cheap fossil fuels – are bringing on global warming which could mean Bangladesh losing as much as one fifth of its territory

"That's the equivalent of Britain losing all land south of London and Bristol. We would be very indignant if that was caused by people round the back of the world who'd been over-indulging."

I'm impressed, I said, but what are we supposed to do? To be fair to the Bangladeshis we'd have to go back to eating ground-nuts and living in tents.

"No, no. An acceptable level of affluence would be something akin to what we had

How many fewer children should we

Myers paused. "Well, I'd hesitate to offer an estimate because it's a complicated calculation: I'm hedging, of course. The optimum population for Britain, sustainable in a global context, would be a good deal less than what we have now unless we're prepared to get into a much more streamlined economy with far less waste and more efficient modes of Isn't there a more compelling argument for us to reproduce less, apart, that is, from wanting the cash for more consumption?

"Suppose the trade-off was more vacations in the Caribbean or learning to

I might do that, I said. "Had you ever thought explicitly of that

Not personally, I said. But I'm sure people do, which is why they have only 1.7 kids, or whatever it is. But if we've got to bring it down to 1.1, isn't it going to be a bit of a problem?

"Yes," he admitted. "It would be a very big problem."

Norman Myers was not born an eco-freak. It was somehow reassuring to learn that this modest marathon-runner read French and German at Oxford and worked as a district officer in the colonial service in up country Kenya before that country's looming population explosion turned him to planetary economics.

He travelled the world, took a PhD at Berkeley and worked with UN agencies before concluding that he had no time for "corridor politics", and set out as a freelance consultant.

Why do people and politicians continue to ignore the sums you and others put in front of them? I asked him.

"In many countries, such as sub-Saharan Africa, it's a culturally taboo subject and politicians don't want to upset the electorate. In Latin America they say the place is underpopulated because there is so much space. Some countries believe large populations mean political power and economic strength. They quote the US. Russia and Japan. They ignore the example of Israel, say, or the Netherlands."

I suggested population doomsters such as Paul Ehrlich and the Club of Rome had spiked their own guns by exaggeration. Myers countered that since Ehrlich's 1968 prediction of massive famine, 250m people had died of starvation, though not, admittedly, all in one place. Technology had only postponed the problem. For three decades to 1984 the plough had kept ahead of the stork, but since then there had been eight lean years in which food production had failed to keep pace. The Club of Rome report in the 1970s had been premature, he admitted, and had ignored some important feedback loops (e.g. prices) but its latest report was more sophisticated.

Why isn't the US taking a lead? "Because American political leaders won't lead. They're too bound up with their next election. They think that doubling the tax on gasoline to bring it more into line with European rates would be unacceptable. In real terms Americans were paying two and half dollars a gallon in 1981. They shouldn't scream if they are asked to pay double the present price of

But all politicians were at fault in refusing to recognise that raising fossil-fuel efficiency to match, say, the Japanese would be very good for their

How can you say Britain is overpopulated? I asked him. There is no starvation. The rivers may be a bit low and the beaches a bit dirty, but we live very comfortably. But we depend on a shadow ecology, as

call it, which is five times the size of Britain and on which we depend for some 40 per cent of our food." He conceded that effective population control could take several generations after millenia of carefree breeding. "Governments are reluctant to intervene beyond the bedroom door. And yet we accept a minimum age for sexual intercourse, for getting married. We plan every aspect of our economies except the

aren't there moral limitations? Are Catholics who accept the Vatican line on birth control to be coerced? such a tiny minority now. Anyway the European country with the lowest fertility rate is Italy and the part of Italy with the lowest fertility rate is Rome.

Surely you mean the Vatican City? "I should hope so," Myers laughed. What about the Moslems?

"The Koran says various forms of contraception are legitimate. The real problem is women in purdah. Only about 5 per cent have been to primary school, their social standing is low and they can't stand up to their husbands." You have said zero population growth could be achieved in Britain by the "simple expedient" of preventing all unwanted births.

"It's simple but not easy. It's a matter of education. After a Saturday night out and a couple of pints, anything can happen. That sounds awfully patronising but there are a lot of people who end up with unwanted pregnancies."

There should be financial disincentives for having more than two children. "If you have three and impose a lot of spillover costs on society then I'd devise ways to make you pay those costs." Myers referred approvingly to one economist's proposal that everybody should be given a single "child voucher" at birth. Couples could have their two children or sell their vouchers to someone else.

Enforcement could be tricky, I said.

'Exceedingly.'

The world population is over 5bn. In 100 years' time it could as high as 141/bn or as low as 8bn. "There's a lot to play for," said Myers. "I say we should go for the lower figure. Either we choose to do it or nature will do it for us - and nature will not do

Surely, it will discriminate against the poorest. People like you and I will be as comfortable as ever.

"I don't think so. Because one of the decades, I believe, will be mass migration from developing to developed countries. What we have now in Europe is peanuts compared with what lies ahead. The social tensions we have seen in Germany and France already are nothing to what is to Global warming could give Britain an arid Mediterranean landscape. In such a world - "a world in uproar and full of gunsmoke" - Britain simply could not trade. There could be 300m or 500m refugees battering on the doors of the rich nations. "We win with the Third World or we shall lose with them," Myers said. Yet it would cost only some $40bn a year to make agriculture in the Third World environmentally sustainable - which is what rich nations already spend on slimming aids. To meet demand for contraception would cost taxpayers in the North a penny a week. "It needn't cost the earth to save the earth and it would give a much better return in the long run than anything available on the London stock exchange."

How many children have you got?
"Two: both daughters. And I dearly wish, I'm really ticked off that I couldn't have more . . . for professional reasons. I wish there was a bank or something at the United Nations to which I could pay £10,000 or £12,000 a year to cover the social costs. And then, boy, I would certainly have a third child. Heavens, yes."

The sad victims: Britain's editors

are under threat from a force so powerful that none has been able to withstand it. We know this because the editors themselves have told us how this mighty power has manipulated them, consistently, and over a long period. Strangely, it is just one person. She is a woman. She has no organisation: indeed she has been compelled to share an office with her estranged husband. She is no great intellect, without a single 'O' level to her name. She is not a newspaper proprietor, indeed she has no power of any kind to decide what shall appear in any newspaper. But this, apparently, is all irrelevant: the press, innocent dupes to a man, have been consistently manipulated by her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales. That, at least, is what they have been saying all week.

Cynics might argue that this was merely a ruse, to ensure that they would enjoy the sympathy of their readers at a time when the government was contemplating whether or not to implement Sir David Calcutt's proposals to set up statutory controls over the press. But that would imply that tabloid newspaper editors would stoop so low as to manipulate their readers' emotions - a disgraceful

What is the basis of the newspapers allegations about the Princess of Wales? They must, surely, have hundreds of examples of her manipulation. Well, as a matter of fact, they don't. It is all based on a single leaked letter from Lord McGregor, the chairman of the Press Complaints Commission, to Sir David Cal-

According to McGregor: "I was told by Mr Andrew Knight, executive chairman of News International, that the princess was participating in the provision of informa-tion for tabloid editors about the state of her marriage.'

Knight's anxiety to put this opinion to Lord McGregor was understandable. News International in its various guises was BRITAIN'S newspapers busily serialising Andrew Morton's book on the Princess of Wales. Lord McGregor, acting quite outside his remit, since his commission had received no complaint, took it upon himself portentously to denounce the reports of Morton's book as odious exhibition of journalists dabbling their fingers in the stuff of other people's

Perhaps, if Lord McGregor had taken the trouble to ring up Knight beforehand, he could instead have issued a statement denouncing the Princess of Wales. For he subsequently appeared to take the hardly disinterested words of the News International chairman as gospel, even though Morton himself, who ought to know if anyone, has categorically stated that the Princess did not co-operate with his book.

nstead, Lord McGregor merely com-plained, with breathtaking effrontery, that "The Princess of Wales in this situation seriously embarrased the Commission." The media could not believe their luck: they could use McGre-gor's gibberings to blame the Princess for all their own intrusions.

The Times, in attempting to back up Knight's claims about the Princess's manipulations, stated with absolute assurance that the Prince Charles/Camilla Parker Bowles taped telephone conversation was leaked to the Daily Mirror (where it was first reported) "by the Princess's friends".

Richard Stott, the then editor of the Daily Mirror wrote to complain that this was completely untrue, that the tape "was offered to us at one of our branch offices and it was recorded by a very ordinary member of the general public. If you are looking for a plot you won't find it here."

No, indeed. The only plot has been by powerful men to pretend that they have been manipulated by one woman, when they have at all times had complete freedom and discretion to publish what they want, when they want, how they want. It is called the freedom of the press. ■ Dominic Lawson is editor of The

It has to be a chronograph with perpetual calendar and moon phase display up to the year 2499. That stops the time exactly to an eighth of a second and thereby automatically counts the minutes and the hours.

A chronograph that even knows automatically whether the month has 28, 29, 30 or 31 days for centuries to come.

A chronograph that shows, day in day out, the position of the moon in the sky. And automatically changes the date, weekday, month and even the year - without the need for any correction - up to New Year's Eve 2199. A chronograph with a case crafted in 18ct yellow gold on which the individual serial number and your own name is engraved on the base. Even in the most unlikely event of you ever coming across a watch with these astonishing features, there would still be one significant feature missing:

The Da Vinci is made by IWC.

It has to be a chronograph that's slim enough to fit on a woman's wrist. A chronograph that makes it easier to find excuses for being late for an appointment - to the second precisely, where otherwise you could only excuse yourself for the delay of minutes or A chronograph that cannot tell you what is written in the stars, but will accurately inform you of the moon phase at any given time. A chronograph with date display. And with an individual serial number engraved on the solid gold case. On which a name may be engraved that is equally worthy of the Da Vinci by IWC: Your own name.

As you know, the chancellor is an odd-ball - an entertaining fellow, good at party conferences, but headstrong and flamboyant. I shall announce his new post four weeks after the Budget. On the other hand, a considerable sum of money has got to be found, so find it I shall. The Budget will reveal subtle ways for rehabilitating the public

In the meantime, I believe Michael wishes to broach a scheme for rehabilitating the royal finances and recapturing the love and affection which formerly marked your reign. Hawks & Handsaws: Yah, right. It is a deeply ingenious scheme, but it will need a big sponsor. That is why I asked Lord King to join our tele-conference. The reason.
